Countries co-operate on agricultural R&D

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In what is being described as a win-win-win situation, representatives from Canada, Israel and China met last week in Ottawa to cement a scientific relationship that could pay off in enhanced agricultural productivity and access to the vast Chinese market.

More than 60 political and business leaders, along with scientific researchers, met at the Chateau Laurier Hotel to discuss implementing a three-way agreement whose principals were enunciated last November in Yangling, China.

The gathering, known as the Second Canada-China-Israel Roundtable on Agri-Innovation, was meant to advance three-way research into the technologies that enhance agriculture.

"We went down to brass tacks," said Henri Rothschild, president and CEO of International Science and Technology Partnerships Canada (ISTP Canada), which organized the event.

The participants ended their one-day meeting with the "Ottawa declaration," which stated the parties would issue a call for proposals from companies, research institutes and universities from the three countries to coincide with the annual Yangling China Agricultural Fair in November 2009. The call for proposals would invite "applications for collaborative industrial R&D projects" that would "focus on the application of high technology to the sustainable development of agriculture and agri-foods."

United Church weighs anti-Israel measures

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The United Church of Canada is under fire from Jewish groups as it prepares to consider a series of resolutions advocating boycotts and sanctions against Israel for its treatment of the Palestinians.

The church, Canada's largest Protestant denomination, will hold its 40th General Council – its foremost decision-making conference – from Aug. 9 to 16 in Kelowna, B.C.

Among the proposals being brought forward to the national body by various regional branches are four resolutions that advocate a boycott, divestment and sanctions strategy by the church against Israel.

The resolutions – drafted jointly by the church's Toronto Conference's Holy Land Awareness and Action Committee, a subcommittee of the Toronto branch's World Action Committee, along with the church's Montreal and Ottawa conferences – call for a "comprehensive boycott of Israeli academic and cultural institutions at the national and international levels."

Accompanying support documents also refer to Israel's assault on Gaza earlier this year as a "visible reminder of the ongoing Israeli regime of exclusion, violence and dehumanization directed against Palestinians."

Israel, the proposal states, was "built mainly on land ethnically cleansed of its Palestinian owners."

The subcommittee's website also features a link titled "Companies to boycott," which leads to a downloadable list of firms that it calls "non-peaceful," mostly for supplying the Israel Defence Forces. Examples include Boeing, Caterpillar, Lockheed Martin, General Electric, Motorola and Volvo.

There is no mention on the site of anti-Israel terrorist groups such as Hamas or Hezbollah, or any material criticizing their activities.

Judaic Studies Is Back

WINNIPEG — After 20 years, the University of Manitoba will once again have a Judaic studies program. The school, which in the 1950s became th.. first Canadian university to establish such a program, dropped it in 1989 just as other Canadian schools were ramping up theirs or establishing new ones, U of M said m a release. Starting this fall, students can choose from a range of nine courses toward a minor in Judaic studies. It's hoped a major will be offered eventually, religion professor Justin Jaron Lewis, who heads the program with history professor Benjamin Baader, told the Winnipeg Free Press.

Visa Help From Cda.

CARACAS — The Canadian Embassy in Caracas will soon be able to help Venezuelan Jews get Israeli visas, a Canadian official said last week. Currently, Venezuelan Jews wanting to visit Israel must first travel to other countries that have an Israeli diplomatic mission, typically in Bogota or Miami, to request visas. Earlier this year, Canada accepted Israel's request to represent its interests in Venezuela after President Hugo Chavez severed relations with the Jewish state over its military offensive in Gaza. Hundreds of Jews have been unable to travel to Israel as a result, the Confederation of Israelite Associations in Venezuela said. A spokesperson in Ottawa said Canada's embassy in Caracas will soon have an Israeli employee available to receive applications for Israeli visas and transfer them to an Israeli Embassy abroad that can issue visas, which will be sent back to Caracas. A start date has yet to be set. Venezuelan Jewish leaders met with Israeli Foreign Ministry officials in Colombia last week to discuss the visa problem. The officials were accompanying Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman on his 10-day trip to South America.

'Bruno' Threatened

LONDON — Jewish comedian Sacha Baron Cohen has increased his security detail after a Palestinian terror group threatened him last week. The Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade threatened the British entertainer for including one of its members in his most recent film, Bruno, the Telegraph reported. "We reserve the right to respond in the way we find suitable against this man," the group said of Cohen. "The movie was part of a conspiracy against the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades." Playing Bruno, a flamboyantly gay Austrian journalist, Cohen interviews Ayman Abu Aita, identified as a leader of the Brigades. At one point, Bruno beseeches Aita to take him hostage, saying, "I want to be famous. I want the best guys in the business to kidnap me. Al Qaeda is so 2001."

Supremacist Indicted

WASHINGTON — A grand jury last week indicted the white supremacist charged with killing a guard at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. In addition to existing murder charges, hate crimes charges were added, for a total of seven counts in the indictment. Some may incur the death penalty. James Von Brunn, 89, charged with shooting Stephen Johns on June 10, is recovering in hospital from wounds sustained when guards returned fire.

Consultant Dead

NEW YORK — A New Jersey political consultant charged with accepting a bribe in a huge corruption scandal was found dead. Jack Shaw, a longtime Democratic strategist, was found July 28 at his home in Jersey City. A prosecutor in the case told the New York Times his death was suspicious, while the Star-Ledger of Newark reported that pill bottles were found near Shaw's body. He was accused of accepting $10,000 (US) from a Jewish informant posing as a developer. Shaw was one of 44 people – including rabbis, and top political figures – arrested last month in a corruption and money-laundering probe.

Ministers Visit Shul

CARACAS — The foreign ministers of Spain and Venezuela visited a Caracas shul that was attacked earlier this year. "They sent a strong message repudiating anti-Semitism," said Claudio Ethelma, director of the Latin American Jewish Congress, who travelled from Argentina for last week's visit. It was the second by Venezuela's foreign minister to Tiferet Israel Synagogue since the January attack, when burglars vandalized holy objects, sprayed anti-Semitic phrases on walls and stole members' personal information. The attack coincided with a period of tension after Israel's Gaza incursion, which President Hugo Chavez castigated. Thirteen people have been arrested for the break-in.

Men Allegedly Plotted Attacks on Israel

RALEIGH — Seven North Carolina residents were charged with plotting to commit terrorist attacks around the world, including in Israel.

U.S. federal prosecutors charged six American citizens and one foreign national in an indictment unsealed July 27. The group's leader, Daniel Boyd, a convert to Islam, reportedly trained in terrorist camps in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Three years ago, he began recruiting men, including his sons, Zakariya and Dylan, to wage jihad, or holy war. The group had amassed a large cache of weapons and held training exercises in North Carolina, which tipped off federal officials, the Washington Post reported.

Several of the men travelled to Israel, Gaza and Jordan in 2006 and 2007. In Israel in 2007, they reportedly intended to engage in "violent jihad" but didn't do any fighting. Some of the men also went to Pakistan and Kosovo.

Boyd also is charged with lying to customs and FBI agents about the purpose of his visit to Israel. He and the six others were charged with conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and conspiracy to murder, kidnap, maim and injure persons abroad. Some also face weapons charges. They face life in prison if convicted

H1N1 peters out at Muskoka camps

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After dealing with more than 100 cases of the H1N1 virus in the first session of camp, Michael Wolf, the director of Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont., said he is happy to announce that the camp is now flu free.

"Everyone co-operated, and the parents in the Toronto area supported us by taking their kids home to recuperate, if possible."

The ailing campers who did remain at camp – all reported cases were mild – were isolated from the other campers, "and they became their own community. They took part in their own activities, including an arts and crafts project in which they made ceramic pigs," Wolf told The CJN.

"By and large, this core group took care of each other, and we are proud of them."

At Camp Agudah, an Orthodox camp in Port Carling, Ont., about 40 campers fell ill, some of whom were sent home, and at Camp George, a Reform movement camp in Parry Sound, Ont., some 20 campers were sent home to recuperate.

Visitors day cancelled at Kadimah in Nova Scotia due to outbreak of the virus

Camp Tamarack, a Jewish-owned camp in Bracebridge, said that since July 16 when it had an "unspecified" number of cases, it has seen "a virtual elimination in the number of individuals with the familiar symptoms of this particular virus."

Dr. Na-Koshie Lamptey, acting associate medical officer of health at the Simcoe Muskoka District Health Unit, said she is "quite pleased" that outbreaks at two of the camps are officially over, and that the unit expects to declare the other two camps free of the virus in the coming days.

She praised the camps for working co-operatively with the health unit to quickly isolate ill campers and for communicating good hygiene to all campers and staff.

"The camps were receptive to the message we communicated and were diligent about communicating with parents in order to reassure them."

Meanwhile, at Camp Kadimah, in Barss Corner, N.S., visitors day, set for July 26, was cancelled due to an outbreak of the virus at camp.

In a letter to the parents, camp co-chairs Michael Pink, Jim Spatz and Victor Goldberg said that after consultations with Nova Scotia Public Health and discussions with the camp's medical staff, they decided "it was the most prudent course of action.

"Fortunately, all cases have been mild. The kids are quickly getting better and are in good spirits. Our priority is always the health and well-being of our campers and staff. We have implemented many protocols and are seeing a reduction in new cases, and hope that we have turned the corner."

They said they were "disappointed" to have had to make the decision to cancel visitors day, "but know that it is the best course."

Bank Hapoalim Appoints Financial Leader to Head Board of Directors

Bank Hapoalim, Israel's leading bank, with a recognized global presence, has named Mr. Yair Seroussi Vice Chairman of its Board of Directors. Mr. Seroussi will assume the role of Chairman of the Board of Directors on August 1st, 2009.

With the appointment of Mr. Seroussi, the Bank is welcoming back an important former board member, as Mr. Seroussi served on the Board from 1997 through 2002, the full term limit for an external director. During this period, Mr. Seroussi was the Chairman of the Audit Committee and a member of all Board of Management committees. Mr. Seroussi therefore brings to his new position not only his vast experience in Israeli and global financial markets, but also intimate knowledge of the Bank's operations.

Mr. Seroussi is seen as the right person at the right time, as the Bank positions itself to effectively cope with, and grow beyond, the financial crisis that has challenged economies worldwide. He has extensive, multi-dimensional experience in both private and public financial sectors. Mr. Seroussi established the Morgan Stanley Israel office in 1993, and has since headed the operation. In addition, since 2003, he has served as the Chairman of the Investment Committee of Mivtachim, Israel's largest pension fund. Furthermore, he is Chairman and Co-founder of Europort and Chairman and Co-founder of the Mustang Mezzanine Fund.

Mr. Yair Seroussi

Over the past decade, Mr. Seroussi held senior positions at Israel's Ministry of Finance, including Head of the Ministry's mission in the US and manager of the Commodities Division of the State, which was privatized under his leadership. During his tenure in government service, Mr. Seroussi was a prime driver and manager of crucial national financing programs, achieved recognition by international rating companies and contributed to the creation of the venture capital funds industry in Israel.

Currently, Mr. Seroussi serves as a director of Israel Corp., DSPG and Frutarom Industries. He is a member of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew University.

In welcoming his appointment, Mr. Seroussi emphasized that he considered it a significant challenge to "participate in navigating Israel's major bank through a period of worldwide crises.

"Concurrently," he immediately noted, "I have strong confidence in the Bank's core resilience and ability to identify and nurture opportunities as they arise. Over the years, Bank Hapoalim has proven to be exceptionally flexible in responding to and anticipating change. It is this combination of balance and agility that makes the Bank so prominent in Israel's economic development and has earned it respected international standings."

"Personally, my family has strong roots in Uruguay; I am therefore very familiar with the important impact banks such as ours can have for communities abroad."

Regarding the Bank's internal development, Mr. Seroussi confirmed he would make every effort to understand and motivate employees, "for they are our most prized asset," he concluded.

Mr. Seroussi holds a BA degree in Economics and Political Science from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In response to calumny

From the editor's desk...

The ongoing catalogue of condemnation of Israel over its conduct in its war in Gaza against Hamas is a disheartening repeat of the near-exultant excoriation of the Jewish state five years ago over the accusations of a massacre in Jenin.

As it did then, the mainstream media has seized upon and repeated as seeming truth, sensational allegations of misbehaviour against Israeli soliders.

The latest feeding frenzy against the Jewish state was on the carcass of unsubstantiated charges made by anonymous, unidentified individuals chronicled in a book of testimony by Breaking the Silence, a self-styled human rights organization in Israel.

The testimonies are purportedly by soldiers who fought in Gaza. But there is no way to test the truth of the accusations, let alone defend against them, since not a single testimony is referred back to any source.

The fact that the organization gave its report to the media for wide publicity before they turned it over to the Israel Defence Forces for wide investigation, is merely further evidence of the exploitative nature of the organization's true purpose.

In the circumstances, it is reasonable to conclude that Breaking the Silence – how dramatic and heroic a name for any group, let alone a human rights group – intended that the charges be smeared rather than investigated.

It has been subsequently brought to light that the human rights activists of Breaking the Silence have been generously funded by some of the political departments of various government offices in Europe, most notably the Netherlands and England. The Israeli Foreign Ministry has since begun its own investigation into the group's funding.

Coverage of Breaking the Silence's allegations followed by some weeks similarly graphic coverage of wholly unsubstantiated, also anonymous, third-hand accusations against IDF soldiers and officers purportedly made by fellow soldiers at an IDF ethics-training seminar. Those allegations were subsequently discredited.

That coverage, too, followed merely by a few weeks the expansive coverage given to accusations by Amnesty International that the Jewish state committed war crimes in its war against Hamas.

Israel refuted the allegations and pointed out, not surprisingly, that the Amnesty report was remarkably, though alas, not surprisingly, deficient and thin in providing background, context and factual credibility for its conclusions.

Yet another report examining Israel's conduct in its war against Hamas was commissioned by the Human Rights Council of the United Nations. It will be presented in September to the council by the head of the investigative team, Judge Richard Goldstone of South Africa.

That abuses may have been or even were committed during the war by Israeli soldiers is horrible, but hardly news. Abuses are committed by all soldiers of all countries during war. That is, sorrowfully, the nature of war, given the chaos, fear, hair-trigger edginess, kill-or-be-killed, gut-wrenching nervousness of combat.

But the abuses are being investigated by the IDF. Where claims against soldiers are supported by facts, they are investigated and the abusers are brought to account. To date, some 100 cases have been or are being pursued.

In response to the allegations made by Breaking the Silence, Israel responded forcefully and unambiguously: "The IDF operates on the foundation of uncompromising ethical values. These values continue to guide the IDF in every mission."

Last week the IDF released a detailed discussion paper titled The Operation in Gaza – 27 Dec 2008 – 18 Jan 2009: Factual and Legal Aspects. The paper was obviously prepared as a response to the myriad accusers of the Jewish state and its army. It is a 160-page document that confronts, head on, the serious, bona fide, conscience-bothered questioners of the IDF's operations in Gaza, as well as the single-minded, mala fide, ideologically based defamers of the IDF.

Another response to the calumnies hurled by Israel's accusers has been made available by CAMERA, the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America. The Boston-based media resource centre has just published a new monograph by Alan Dershowitz called The Case for Moral Clarity: Israel, Hamas and Gaza.

The book contains some 26 chapters of opinion, commentary and debate. In typical Dershowitz style, it is bold and assertive.

He explains why he compiled the work. "Constructive criticism of Israel and its policies is healthy It is ongoing in Israel and among its supporters throughout the world. Demonizing the Jewish state or subjecting its actions to a double standard is wrong and must be answered in the marketplace of ideas. That is why I wrote and published the material in this short book."

Dershowitz then writes what should be a prescription for all of us. "I will continue to fight against those who would destroy Israel – by rockets, suicide bombs, nuclear weapons, falsehoods, bigotry, divestments, boycotts or any other means – as long as I have the strength to do so."

New Claims Conference VP wants more funding

'Intolerable situation' that some survivors can't afford to buy food

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The new executive vice-president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany says he will strive to obtain more funding for the victims of Nazi oppression.

The funds will be used to tend to the social welfare needs of needy Holocaust survivors, Gregory Schneider said in an interview shortly after his appointment was announced in New York City recently.

Gregory Schneider

Founded after World War II, the Claims Conference represents world Jewry in negotiations for compensation and restitution for victims of Nazi persecution and their heirs.

Schneider said that 26,000 survivors worldwide are dependent on soup kitchens for their daily meals.

Calling this an "intolerable situation," Schneider said it's "painful" that some survivors are so impoverished that they can't afford to buy food, much less medicine, or pay for in-home care and rent.

Schneider, whose wife's parents are survivors from Poland, said the Claims Conference has begun negotiations with Germany so that their needs can be met.

Stating that many elderly Nazi victims are in poor health due to "the deprivations and persecution of their youth," he said that current talks with the German government are designed to ensure that survivors can live out their final years in comfort and dignity.

The Claims Conference is also asking Germany for additional and increased compensation payments.

"There are still 8,000 [survivors] of concentration camps, ghettos and forced labor [battalions] who still do not receive any pension," he said. "Because of German eligibility criteria, there are camp survivors who are not entitled to the monthly payments that are made by the Claims Conference to others who may have been right alongside them during the Shoah. This must change."

In addition, he noted, there are almost 100,000 victims of Nazism in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union who are ineligible for one-time payments from the Claims Conference.

"More than 350,000 such victims who immigrated to the West have received the payment. It is not right [that the others] should now be treated differently based on where they live today. This must change."

Schneider said his third priority is to ensure that Jews who lost property during the Holocaust are fully compensated.

"In partnership with the Jewish Restitution Organization, we must continue working to attain full restitution for Jewish assets stolen during the Holocaust, especially in eastern Europe," he said. "Survivors, heirs and the Jewish people have the right to receive what was unjustly taken from them."

He added, "Restitution of assets is the final chapter of the legacy of the Holocaust, and one that we cannot allow to remain unfinished."

Schneider said that 70,000 survivors around the globe will receive pensions directly from the Claims Conference this year, while another 20,000 will get one-time payments.

He pointed out that about 250,000 victims of Nazism in 43 countries rely on social services provided through Claims Conference allocations.

Asked what the main problems of survivors are, Schneider replied, "Later in life they suffer from physical and emotional distress at higher rates than the elderly population as a whole. Prolonged malnutrition under the Nazis has affected their health in old age, triggering osteoporosis and broken bones, heart problems, impaired vision, dental problems and high blood pressure. There are particularly high rates of dementia and schizophrenia, and many are alone as a result of having lost their entire family."

In Toronto, he said, the Claims Conference funds emergency assistance grants, home care, medical and dental care, food programs, transportation, case management and socialization programs through Jewish Family and Child, Circle of Care and Baycrest.

In Montreal, similar services are provided through the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, while the group Montreal Child Survivors uses a Claims Conference allocation for a Cafe Europa program.

Claims Conference funds also enable social service agencies in Vancouver and Ottawa to help survivors.

Schneider, who was previously chief operating officer of the Claims Conference, said his organization works closely with Canadian Jewish Congress, which names a representative to its board of directors, and the Canadian Holocaust Survivors Association.

Schneider said the Claims Conference will issue approximately $160 million (US) in direct payments to survivors in Israel in 2009. It will also allocate $82 million (US) for social welfare needs in Israel this year.

"Since 1995, the Claims Conference has been the primary body identifying and providing for the social needs of Nazi victims in Israel," he stated, adding that about $550 million (US) has been channelled to the Jewish state for such purposes.

Schneider – whose maternal Hungarian grandparents lost almost their entire families during the Holocaust – is credited with conceiving and implementing the program for former slaves and forced labourers, which has paid $1.4 billion (US) to 174,000 survivors in 87 nations.

He has also supervised programs to compensate 2,552 victims of Nazi medical experiments, 3,923 refugees who fled to wartime Switzerland and 6,004 survivors of Nazi-occupied Budapest.

As well, Schneider oversaw the institutional allocations program, which enabled German survivors and heirs to file claims for property that was either sold after 1933 under duress or confiscated by the Nazi regime.

CJC concerned by church's stance on Israel

Eric Vernon, Canadian Jewish Congress' director of government relations, told The CJN that his organization is concerned the church's stance on Israel is being distorted by a minority of its members.

He said last week that Congress crafted a detailed response to the proposals and sent it to the church's executive members so that they can better understand the nuanced situation in the Middle East.

A church spokesperson confirmed that the Congress document was received and immediately distributed internally for all the council commissioners to view prior to the start of the General Council.

In response to concerns voiced by the Jewish community, the church posted a statement on its website last week saying that it "has consistently striven for peace with justice in Palestine and Israel" and that its Middle East policy "is shaped and informed by Israeli and Palestinian partners in the region."

Vernon said the current boycott proposals threaten to sever the links between the church and the Canadian Jewish community. The relationship "will definitely be strained" if the resolutions pass at the conference, he added.

He called the proposals "particularly disturbing" because in 2003, at the church's 38th General Council, a document called Bearing Faithful Witness was drafted as a "blueprint for rapprochement in the United Church of Canada and Jewish community. If these current resolutions are passed, they will be consigning Bearing Faithful Witness to the dustbin."

Congress is concerned that church members are being misinformed.

"There doesn't seem to be a full appreciation for the existential threat that Israel faces on a daily basis," Vernon said. "They have a skewed vision of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. And they seem to place all the blame for a lack of a [peaceful] resolution on Israel and don't hold the Palestinians responsible for much of anything at all. The church seems to be persuaded by the views of people on the margins of their community."

Karin Brothers, a Toronto Conference member who brought forward the motions on Israel, and who's listed on the conference's website as its Holy Land Awareness subcommittee's primary contact, couldn't be reached for comment.

However, she is on record with her views on Jews and Israel.

During her 2006 trip with a United Church delegation to Nablus and after her visit with An-Najah National University representatives, the university's website posted the following paragraph: "The reasons for [the West's biased Israel] coverage are hinted by Karin Brothers, a housewife actively engaged in documenting the conflict. 'The Jewish lobby is indeed very powerful, not only in the U.S. but also in Canada,' she says. 'A significant amount of elections money comes from the Jewish community, to the extent that right after the massacre of Jenin, about 96 per cent of [the U.S.] Congress was in favour of Israel. They created something like an Israeli solidarity vote to support Israel. It's at that moment that Israel's lobby showed their muscle.'"

The website material goes on to state that Brothers "has no doubt about the influence of the Jewish community both in politics and within the media: 'Any politician would be targeted if he turned his back to Israel and would lose his job. It's amazing the amount of people, especially politicians, who are offered a free trip to Israel.'"

When presented with Brothers' statements, Rev. Bruce Gregersen, the church's General Council officer for programs, said it was the first he'd heard of her comments. He called them "unfortunate," before adding quickly that the General Council "would never use language like that."

He added that while Brothers is a church member, she's also "an individual who is part of other organizations as well, who has freedom to speak as one, but does not speak for the church."

With respect to the resolutions, Rev. Gregersen said the church's stance on a safe and secure Israel has remained steadfast since its 38th General Council in 2003 and that he would be "totally amazed" if that changed after next week's general council.

"Council historically has taken seriously the right of Israel to exist as a Jewish state within safe and secure borders. And we realize that even the language 'right to exist' is not helpful. Israel exists as a Jewish state. Security for Israel is an utmost necessity," he said. "But that has not stopped the council from also stating that both the United Church of Canada and the world has the right to call Israel to action around the occupation, and on finding a pathway to peace that involves the creation of a Palestinian state and homeland as well. But when one speaks of the safety of Israel, one is also talking about the end of [Palestinian] attacks on Israel." With files from JTA

Former CJPAC head finds green pastures at JNF

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Cooper new executive director of JNF Toronto

"I never thought I'd be a Jewish community professional growing up. But the respect I have for them and the passion they have has shown me a whole different side of the community."

So says Josh Cooper, the now former executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) – which he helped found in 2005 – who, on Aug. 1, became the new executive director of Jewish National Fund (JNF) Toronto.

Sitting in his office among packed boxes on his last official day at CJPAC last month, Cooper told The CJN he felt the committee had now reached a point of strength wherein it could continue on under new leadership.

"I was hired to start a national advocacy organization. Four-and-a-half years later, I can say I did. So now it's on to the next challenge. If I'm going to [change jobs], this is a good time," he said.

"I'm leaving now because I can. CJPAC is as strong as it has ever been… [and] will continue promoting political engagement and I can go on and help JNF."

Cooper said under his stewardship, CJPAC – whose mandate is to encourage Canadian Jews to become active in politics, regardless of party preference – now has "thousands" of paid members across Canada and has established a number of annual initiatives and programs aimed at boosting youth involvement in politics.

Some of these include "mock election" camp tours and visits to Parliament Hill with high school and university students.

He said if he was to remain executive director of CJPAC, its next objectives would likely be to increase membership, open a new office somewhere in the West and strive for "overall increased levels of engagement." But he quickly qualified that the next executive director will make his or her own decisions.

While no one has been named to replace Cooper at CJPAC, he said his successor will be determined through an "open process."

Looking toward his new role at JNF – where he replaces longtime executive director Ben Prossin, who died last February – Cooper said he's excited to join an organization that, contrary to the relatively new CJPAC, has existed for more than 100 years in service of Israel.

"It's the first time I'll have an opportunity to work with an existing brand," he said. "If you're passionate about Israel, it's the place to be."

He said one of his biggest challenges will be transferring the same energy he brought to CJPAC over to JNF.

At 39, Cooper said he was considered the "old man" at CJPAC, but he realizes that dynamic will change as soon as he sets foot in JNF, with its seasoned staff.

"I've got 108 years of [JNF] history to catch up on, and only two weeks to do it," he laughed.

Josh Cooper

It's his hope, he said, that he can bring a youthful passion about Israel and his experiences at CJPAC in drawing the attention of Jewish youth to JNF.

"The 40-and-under crowd know a little about JNF, but not as much as they should. In order for the 20-to-40 demographic to get more involved in JNF, they need to know what it does," he said.

To that end, Cooper said one of the areas he's been asked to look at once he starts his new job is the area of "young leadership."

"I need to focus on the younger demographic. It's about getting them involved, on board. Trees are certainly a part of [JNF's activities], no doubt, but there's much more," he said.

Harkening back to the methods he used at CJPAC to grab the attention of young people, Cooper said that at JNF, he'll be paying a lot of attention to new technologies, which he said are crucial to reaching today's youth and 30somethings.

Not that he wants to alienate the organization's older patrons.

"Certainly you don't want to do anything at the expense of your base… but there's a huge opportunity with the under-50 demographic. I need to focus on them in terms of new development. There's no reason they shouldn't be more involved," Cooper said.

"[In May], JTA put out a list of the Top 20 influential Jewish organizations that use Twitter. CJPAC was the only Canadian organization on that list. I take great pride in that."

Although he's not looking to politicize his new employer, Cooper said he's open to working with CJPAC and any other organizations that want to help JNF.

"We're all in this for the same reasons. It's better for us as a community to present a united front," he said. "I'm not in a silo. It's whoever wants to work with us. At CJPAC we worked with many Jewish organizations in some form or other."

Cooper is also no stranger to the art of the schmooze. In 2004 he ran as MP candidate for the Conservatives in the riding of Thornhill after meeting a then relatively unknown Stephen Harper and being inspired by his pro-Israel political stance, he said. He ultimately lost to Liberal Susan Kadis, but his experience allowed him to hone his abilities as a successful networker.

"I didn't grow up a political junkie, but I saw politics as the best way to make a difference for Israel," he said.

Asked if he would ever return to politics, Cooper, the founder and former owner of Par Golf Camps, said he never says never, but right now he's happy continuing his career as a Jewish community leader.

"As a career path, it's something more people should be considering. At the end of the day, to be able to make a real difference, it's great."

Dead Sea Scrolls give 'snapshot' of their time: curator

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Dead Sea Scrolls guest curator Risa Levitt Kohn grew up in the Toronto Jewish community and spent countless hours exploring the Royal Ontario Museum over the years.

Having the opportunity to be a part of the ROM's historic exhibit, which continues until Jan. 3, 2010, is a dream come true, she said.

"For me, personally, to have an opportunity to come back to Toronto and work at the ROM... You have to pinch yourself and say, 'Is this really happening?'"

Risa Levitt Kohn

Levitt Kohn, who is director of the Jewish studies program at San Diego State University and an associate professor of Hebrew Bible and Judaism in SDSU's religious studies department, said she is particularly fascinated by Jewish and Christian origins.

Before Levitt Kohn got a degree in history from York University, she was educated in the Jewish day school system, at the United Synagogue Day School and at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"During my time at York, I did an overseas program at Hebrew University [of Jerusalem] and that is when I really became interested in ancient history and specifically in the history of Israel," said Levitt Kohn, who has been involved in curating three separate Dead Sea Scrolls exhibitions in North America.

She began a master's degree in Jewish history at Hebrew U, but she completed her master's at the University of Toronto.

Levitt Kohn said that within the past few weeks she's given a number of lectures on the scrolls, including one on July 12 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, as part of its Dead Sea Scrolls Series, and she expects to give more lectures while the scrolls are on display.

On Dec. 15, she will deliver a lecture at the ROM titled "Jewish and Christian Origins Are Revealed by the Dead Sea Scrolls."

Levitt Kohn said that one of the many things that makes this exhibition different from others is that it is not a travelling exhibition. The 16 scrolls – which are divided into two groups of eight, with each group being displayed for three months – will return to the Israel Antiquities Authority in Israel to rest for a full year under dark, climate-controlled conditions.

"Every museum that I've worked with has built a show from the ground up. What that has meant for me is that I have had the opportunity to create three completely different shows," she said.

"Every aspect of the design, from the content to the graphics, to the space itself, to the look of the cases and the colours on the wall – this [the ROM exhibit] was really a joint effort that we spent probably almost two years working on. I think all of us are so pleased with the way it came together."

Although Levitt Kohn said she is more of an authority on Jewish and Christian origins and the transition from biblical Israel to early Judaism than the scrolls themselves, "the Dead Sea Scrolls falls right smack-dab in the middle of that period. It is a very logical extension of what I do."

As the story goes, the scrolls were discovered in 1947 in caves in the Judean Desert by a Bedouin shepherd.

The scrolls on display at the ROM were written between 250 BCE and 68 CE and are fragments from the books of Genesis, Deuteronomy and Psalms, as well as the sectarian Community Rule, War Scroll and Messianic Apocalypse.

Levitt Kohn said that while the exhibit should be of interest to all Torontonians regardless of their religious backgrounds, it is especially important to the Jewish community because there are so few ancient Jewish written documents.

"When you deal with the field of ancient history, especially Israel, we have so few original written documents. I mean, we have the Bible, but it's not the original copy of the Bible and... we don't have anything like the archives and libraries like you have in Egypt or in Mesopotamia," she said.

"The Dead Sea Scrolls in that sense, are really the biggest and best that we have. It just happens to be from this period where everything was changing religiously, politically, culturally – everything was sort of being turned on its head. To get a snapshot of that period through these original documents is really quite amazing."

She said that the exhibit was designed to guide visitors through "the world where the Dead Sea Scrolls were copied and written" and that means taking them through the country.

"I think that is an important part of the show... this trek from the north through Jerusalem to Qumran. I would think that people who know very little about the country and the period would walk away from a show like this knowing a lot more and having a much better visual picture of what the place looks like," Levitt Kohn said.

"It is such a wonderful promotion of Israel and Israeli culture... I think it's very important, and it's not very often that you get this kind of opportunity to see artifacts from Israel in Canada."

Deferential to Gaza, but where is Gilad Schalit?

U.S. President Barack Obama last week sent a veritable all-star team of mavens and muscle to Jerusalem for high-level discussions with Israeli officials. Defence Secretary Robert Gates, special Mideast envoy George Mitchell, National Security Adviser James Jones and White House Mideast adviser Dennis Ross came to the region to meet with and counsel in turn, primarily, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak.

The visitors' agendas overlapped.

Topping the items for discussion was Iran. The White House is seeking assurances from Israel that it will not resort to military means to stop the development of the Iranian "bomb." As reported in The CJN last week, Barak refused to provide that assurance.

Second on the list was the issue of "settlements" in the West Bank. Obama has repeatedly called upon Israel to freeze their construction. It appears that Netanyahu is lurching toward some kind of understanding with the president on the subject. It has been reported that Netanyahu will suspend new building projects but continue with projects underway. Indeed, last week, Netanyahu announced that a new 900-unit housing project slated for east Jerusalem would be shelved for the time being.

Third on the list was easing the everyday living conditions of the lives of Palestinians. Netanyahu reported to his visitors that many alleviative steps, such as removing some checkpoints, have already been implemented in the West Bank. He also was able to report that Israel plans to transfer several hundred tons of cement and other construction materials, including metal pipes, into the Gaza Strip to facilitate reconstruction of the areas destroyed during the military action in December and January.

But he also unambiguously made clear to the visiting Americans that Israel would not fully open the border crossings into Gaza until Hamas freed Gilad Schalit, the soldier they kidnapped three years ago. Netanyahu is to be commended for his firm stance regarding the freedom of the young Israeli.

The U.S. government is reportedly spearheading a $300-million reconstruction effort for war-torn Gaza. We urge President Obama to tie his deference for the reconstruction of Gaza to young Schalit's release. An international campaign precisely for the purpose of persuading Washington to do so has been started by Schalit's parents.

Obama has made the linkage of contentious issues a key feature of his foreign policy approach toward the Jewish state. He will therefore undoubtedly understand and endorse Israel's similar use of linkage in regard to Gaza.

Even more, it is hoped that he will do the same.

Disgrace to community

The Union for Traditional Judaism and its rabbinic arm, Morashah, the Rabbininc Fellowship of the UTJ, stand in shock and sadness at the crimes allegedly committed by a number of rabbis arrested on July 23, 2009 ("Rabbis arrested in N.J. sting," CJN, July 30). We do not know if they are guilty or innocent, but the charges remind us that every Jew is expected to be of the highest moral fibre as demanded by our Torah and tradition. It is indeed demoralizing to us and our children when rabbinic leadership appears to have failed in such a flagrant way.

The law of the land is the law and those who breach that law are held accountable. If rabbis have been involved in such breaking of the law, we have the confidence in the legal system to deal with it properly. If they are innocent; likewise we trust the law to exonerate them. In our halachic system, for those who truly live by it, the ends could not justify the means.

We pray that those who may have sinned so grievously will repent and that this disgrace to our community will be erased by the good works of those who will again make us proud. May it be our will, as well as God's, that this be so.

Rabbi Kelman remembered

I was very moved by your tribute to the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman ("Rabbi Kelman remembered as pioneer of inclusion," CJN, July 9). I met Rabbi Kelman in June 1955, when as rabbi of the Agudath Achim Synagogue in Sherbrooke, Que. (of which my late father-in-law, Menasseh Smith, was president for 30 years) he joined Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat in marrying my wife, Jaqueline, and I.

Our contacts with Rabbi Kelman were few and far between since we married, but the warmth that he displayed to us in our rare encounters made him a revered and long-standing friend of ours. Rabbi Kelman was very young when we first met – Agudath Achim was his first posting – and we have always taken pleasure in noting his growth and achievements over the many years that he served in Toronto.

Our sympathy is extended to his loving family and to the many friends and relatives who mourn his passing.

Cremation and Jewish law

As cremation has grown in popularity among non-Jews, unfortunately, it has similarly become more popular among Jews. Cremation is absolutely forbidden in Jewish law. In the Talmud Gittin, it states how the soul suffers eternally when it is not connected to its former body. It further explains that the individual will not be able to stand up at Tchias Hamaysim, the Resurrection of the Dead. Not only is the soul of a Jew holy, so, too is his/her body. The physical body is a chariot for the holy soul, for without the body, the soul is not able to carry out God's commandments. It is the means by which HaShem's Will may be fulfilled here on earth.

"Resurrection of the Dead" is a fundamental principle of our faith. Would any of us want to be responsible for undue suffering on the other side by severing the soul from its body? The entire Jewish community needs to be enlightened about this issue. My Jewish brothers and sisters: we need to know the law, and we need to act in full accordance of it.

Despots against democracy

The Israelis, Palestinians, Iraqis and Afghanis are victims of the agendas of Middle East Arab despots and their fundamentalist religious cohorts. The Arab despots of Iran, Saudi Arabia and Syria will sacrifice the last "Iraqi/Afghani assassin" and the last "Palestinian freedom fighter" to ensure the perpetuation of their autocratic regimes. These despots are dedicated to the intimidation, subjugation, exploitation and disfranchising of their own citizens and abhor the messages of freedom emanating from emerging Middle Eastern democracies. Israel, the spearhead of democracy in the Middle East, has suffered the brunt of their hatred since its inception. Shame on the international media for presenting international terrorism as instigated by "people hating people." International terrorism is a despicable war of despots against democracy.

How communal norms may lead to improper conduct

By ROBERT WIENER
New Jersey Jewish News

An unwritten commandment permeates many parts of American-Jewish society: It shouldn't be a shande far de goyim (a scandal laid bare to the non-Jewish world).

That fear – that the bad acts of a few Jews may bring great shame to their people's reputation in the eyes of the broader gentile world – is embedded in fears and realities of persecution that have lingered for centuries.

Since the July 23 arrests of 14 Orthodox Jews on money-laundering charges, and a 15th accused of illegally buying and selling kidneys, the word shande – Yiddish for "shame" – has echoed in countless Jewish conversations.

So, too, have fears of anti-Semitism, calls for serious introspection, concerns about media coverage and even some suggestions that the insularity of the Syrian Jewish community may have contributed to the alleged lawbreaking.

"It looks terrible to the outside world, but I am more concerned with the Jewish world," said Mark Charendoff, president of the Jewish Funders Network. "My late father used to say, 'The anti-Semites don't need our help to be anti-Semitic.' "

Shortly after news of the arrests broke, Charendoff wrote an op-ed for the New York Jewish Week urging community leaders to examine whether "something" in the Orthodox world creates "fertile ground" for corruption.

"For me, as an Orthodox Jew, Orthodoxy is supposed to stand for something – a system that creates higher levels of moral conduct and better communities," Charendoff said. "Here we are not just seeing Orthodox Jews, but some Orthodox Jewish leaders. That is extraordinarily disturbing.

"Whenever someone dons the mantle of leadership, it comes with enormous responsibility and influence. One can use that influence for good or for ill."

In the wake of the arrests, some commentators are suggesting the tight bonds of religious observance can sometimes lead to an us-vs.-them view of the outside world.

In an interview with Time magazine, the American-born Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi spoke last week of a "kind of borderless community that in its best expressions, maintains international charity efforts that are second to none. But the dark side of this is a mentality that often too easily slides into rationalizations for acts that cannot be rationalized, with the idea that the end justifies the means."

Rabbi Azriel Fellner, a Conservative rabbi who was raised in a modern Orthodox home and educated at an Orthodox yeshiva, blames the "insularity" of groups like the 75,000-strong Syrian-Jewish community.

Such insularity "is part of the fundamental reason they think they can do things like that," said Rabbi Fellner, the former religious leader at Temple Beth Shalom in Livingston, N.J.

Rabbi Avi Shafran

Adrienne Asch

"They don't think they can be judged by anybody else," he said. "They also feel self-righteous about everything they do – that somehow they've got the key to true Jewish belief and true Jewish law and anyone who deviates from that – even other Orthodox groups – do not match up to who they are. They feel not only insular, but also protected against other people's judgments, and that is dangerous stuff."

A spokesman for Agudath Israel of America, an Orthodox group, says such analyses ignore the positive sides of tightly knit Orthodox communities.

"One of the premises of the haredi community is that it can be stronger and more effective by being insular and protecting our families and children from the influences of the outside world," Rabbi Avi Shafran, Agudah's director of public affairs, said in an e-mail interview. "There is something to be said for that, but on the other hand, the result of that is you are not challenged by outside thinking and the norms of the broader community."

In recent weeks, Rabbi Shafran said he has been pained by reports of haredim rioting in Jerusalem in protest of various rulings by Israel's secular authorities, and now by accusations of wrongdoing by American rabbis.

"There is no question that the recent reports create a sense of shame in us all. But at the same time, we are enjoined by Jewish tradition to not assume guilt on the basis of accusations," Rabbi Shafran said, referring to the corruption probe.

The accusations against fellow religious Jews "reflect negatively on us as divine signals that something is in fact amiss in our lives," he said. "When we all are living as we should be, we believe, such things cannot happen."

Adrienne Asch, director of the Center for Ethics at Yeshiva University, said Jewish communities must confront an ethos that seeks to protect wrongdoers from outside scrutiny.

"It is time for Jews to face the fact that there are criminals among them, just as there are criminals everywhere else," she said. "We should not be protecting criminals for fear of persecution. We should be speaking out for what is fair and just."

At the same time, Jews must be confident enough to treat wrongdoing as the issue, as opposed to what the "outside world" thinks.

"Jews are powerful people," Asch said. "We have got to stop acting as if every terrible thing someone does is a public relations nightmare for Jews, as if we are all about to be persecuted if one person does a bad thing."

But the potential for persecution is on the mind of Etzion Neuer, director of the Anti-Defamation League's New Jersey region.

"It is predictable that anti-Semites will come out on the Internet. This case was no exception," he said. "Unfortunately, issues such as this are fodder for professional anti-Semites."

While the Jewish community is "not immune" from criminal behaviour, Neuer said, he found especially troubling "the visual of a haredi man with long beard and a black yarmulke in handcuffs under arrest. It will be salacious for many anti-Semites, and we have to be vigilant about the way the media convey this message."

Rabbi Shafran viewed the media coverage through a different lens.

"The fact that among the arrested in such a major operation were not only visibly Jewish Jews, but rabbis, was not one any of us could reasonably expect the media to ignore," he wrote in the e-mail. "It does us no benefit to blame the media here."

Of special concern to Asch, a bioethicist, were the charges against Rabbi Levy Izhak Rosenbaum, who is accused of buying kidneys from poor people for $10,000 apiece, then reselling them to the desperately ill for as much as $160,000.

"What he is charged with is trying to buy and sell organs with desperate people," Asch said. "The important word is 'desperate.' Why should people make money by losing parts of their bodies? They compromise their health.

"Why are people buying organs? Because there is not an adequate supply," she said. "It is very disturbing."

The Rabbinical Council of America responds

The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) expresses its deep dismay over the recent charges brought by the United States attorney general against numerous individuals, including several prominent rabbis. We are appalled at the allegations which, if true, violate the letter and the spirit of Jewish law, decency, good citizenship and the norms of our great society.

Jewish law has always emphasized the importance of observing and respecting the laws of the land. They are essential for our shared well-being. No individual stands above the law. If a citizen violates the law, then he must be subject to the penalties imposed by the legal system of our great country. Nonetheless, we must all keep in mind that those accused are entitled to a presumption of innocence and due process.

Members of the Syrian Orthodox community have been particularly affected by these allegations and the stereotypes that have arisen as a result in recent days.

The RCA wishes to extend its support to the Syrian Jewish community and its rabbis. They are an honourable, pious and charitable community, led by many distinguished rabbis. The alleged misdeeds of the few should not be used against the innocent many. We join with our brethren in the Syrian community and with our fellow Jews in praying that the community will find the strength to weather this storm, and restore themselves to function as the great community they have always been.

We are committed as rabbinic leaders for ourselves and our communities to serve as positive role models for all of our fellow Americans. We pledge to do our best in the days ahead so that the entire Jewish community can continue to be a model for all of our fellow Americans as law-abiding and ethically responsible citizens, striving to live in accordance with the highest religious and civic standards of justice and morality.

The Rabbinical Council of America, with national headquarters in New York City, is a professional organization serving nearly 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in the United States, Canada, Israel and around the world. Membership is comprised of duly ordained Orthodox rabbis who serve in positions of the congregational rabbinate, Jewish education, chaplaincies and other allied fields of Jewish communal work.

Opinions

On respecting the law

The news is full of stories of Jews who have broken the law. Especially grievous are the cases of religious Jews who transgressed American civil or criminal laws. Rabbis accused and jailed. People are talking!

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

So what are we to think? How are we to respond?

Firstly, I believe we're obligated to extend to all accused the presumption of innocence. Both according to American principles of justice and Jewish ethical norms, all are innocent until proven guilty. Thus, in this column, I continue to discuss the issue in purely general and theoretical terms that aren't in any way personal or specific to individuals not found guilty in a court of law.

Second must come our agreement that all citizens of a country are bound by the laws of that country, as long as they're ethical. Judaism teaches two relevant axioms: Jews must not follow the religious practices of non-Jews, but Jews are obligated to keep the laws of the land they live in. Thus, there's no religious basis or excuse for a Jew not to pay taxes or to avoid other financial or legal obligations of citizenship. To do so is to violate both the law of the land and Jewish law.

When religious Jews are found guilty of defrauding the public, what does it mean? To me, it means they're not religious. No matter how long their beard or tzitzit, they have violated the law in a public way – that of Judaism as well as the country they live in.

Now, we all sin. God has given us multiple opportunities, including Yom Kippur, to atone for our sins, because it's part of our created nature to sin. We are imperfect. But to sin so publicly brings the matter to another level.

I'm not worried about increased anti-Semitism. I'm worried about the impression made on Jews, on our youngsters. What kind of role model is a rabbi when he's seen in the newspapers violating American law? Moreover, how can we teach respect for Torah, the wisdom of the sages and our heritage, when some hide behind it or use it to cheat?

Where is dignity? In the court of holiness, disrespect has been shown toward both civil society and God. Do God's ways lead to piety or fraud?

So if they're found guilty, I firmly believe that these people aren't more guilty than others in society. But as religious Jews, they're guilty of desecrating God's name and bringing shame to our community.

Our eternal blueprint for identity

I'm just back from a visit to the old country – a.k.a. the United States – and am reminded of the intense patriotism of my former homeland.

It's not at all unusual to see men in uniforms in restaurants or to pass armed forces trucks on the road. Huge American flags fly over car lots and in front of homes and businesses alike. Children recite the Pledge of Allegiance every morning before class begins for the day.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

My family raises and lowers the flag at appropriate times outside their home in Pennsylvania. July 4 is the time for parades in every city, town and smallest hamlet, with whole communities decorating their cars, trucks, bicycles, motorbikes and even baby carriages with the red, white and blue. Fire companies, police forces and all local, state and national politicians line up to wave to their constituents from huge floats mounted on flatbed trucks.

The United States was built on the notion that it could take a multitude of nationalities and mould them into a single identity: out of the many, one. That concept was heartily embraced by Jewish immigrants, who, by and large, structured their lives so as to have at least their children become full-fledged Americans, with little or nothing to distinguish them from the native-born.

But surely Canada is different?

When we came to Canada, my first-generation husband and I met a challenge at the border.

"What's your ethnic origin?" we were asked. "American," we replied. Not an ethnic origin, according to the officers.

Jewish? Nope. (We later found out that "Hebrew" would have worked.)

How about our fathers' origins? My husband replied that his father had been born in Russia. Voila! "Russian," they wrote down. And me? American back to the Revolution. Where before that? Germany. So I entered Canada as a German.

That was in 1965, long before the concept of a multicultural society was enunciated or put into official practice. Today, we can think of ourselves as Canadians of Jewish descent, or as Jewish Canadians, just as we have Chinese Canadians, etc. The concept of an ethnic origin linked to our paternal ancestors has, largely, disappeared, although the census still asks for both religion and ethnic origins. We can share our double identities without worry. Or can we?

Jewish identity has always been a bit "other." Identity is linked sociologically to a shared history, cultural practices, geography and language. Yet Jews' shared language is Hebrew, something few of us speak outside Israel. Geographies? We lived all over the world at one time. What we share is a historical bond and the recognition that, whether we practise it or not, we are tied to the religion of Judaism.

As many of the next generation of Canadian Jews lose a strong denominational sense, as ties to a particular community diminish or basic knowledge of Judaism wanes, will there be less Jewish identity within our community as a whole?

We have begun the reading of Dvarim, the book in which a dying Moses speaks to a generation born with no memory of parental failings in the long trek from slavery to freedom. It will be up to the generation born in the wilderness to forge a national identity in the land of Israel.

Moshe reminds the children how not to behave, since their parents' feckless and fearful ways caused them to be shut out of the Promised Land.

But most importantly for the topic of identity, the combination of long sermon and historical overview that Moses delivers serves as a crash course in identity. "These commandments will be the basis of your new identity as free people in your land."

Over the next six weeks, we read once again the story of the children of Israel's struggle to escape, not from Egypt but from the identity as slaves. We can see the blueprint for a new sense of identity being drawn up. It's been a guide to us for more than 3,000 years, segments of an identity that is still changing and challenging.

British medical press criticizes Israel

Readers of this column will be aware of my continued concern with identifying the varied occurrences of anti-Semitism in society.

The almost fashionable vilification of Israel has served as a cover for what has been referred to as the "new anti-Semitism." Repeated dissemination of erroneous information about the Middle East continually sets Israel up as an easy target for criticism, and this provides some detractors with an ostensibly "legitimate" seal of approval in any campaign against Jews.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Of course, defenders of anti-Israel boycotts and demonstrations, and even defenders of the vicious display this year of anti-Semitism on the streets of Toronto and Montreal during the so-called "Israeli Apartheid Week," all attempt to legitimize selective and unjustified criticism of Israel under the guise of fair comment on an international political situation. But, in reality, it is merely a thinly veiled attempt to cover up an underlying hatred of Jews.

Recently, these anti-Israel attacks have entered the realm of medicine. Some of the editorial views appearing in the prestigious British Medical Journal, The Lancet and the journal of the Royal College of Physicians have turned from pure analyses and discussions of medical science to the world of popular anti-Israel politics. The distorted propaganda surfaces in false and misleading discussions on the health status of Gaza residents. In light of these editorial policies, it is not surprising that there are skewed anti-Israel references in the contents of some articles in these British medical journals.

Some Israel medical scientists, including prominent academics, have responded to these British attacks in blogs and in letters appearing, most frequently, in the Israeli Medical Association (IMA) journal. The writers, editor-in-chief of the IMA journal, Prof. Yehuda Shoenfeld and five others, outline the comparative coverage in the British medical press of deaths occurring in conflicts throughout the world. The article analyzes citations in the British Medical Journal, a wholly-owned subsidiary of the British Medical Association. According to this study, when Europeans kill Europeans (in Bosnia), there was one citation in the publication for every 2,000 deaths. When Africans kill Africans (in Rwanda), there was one citation for every 4,000 deaths. When Muslim Arabs kill black Africans (in Darfur), there is one citation in the publication for every 7,000 deaths. These are all tragic occurrences of human suffering.

Contrast these events, however, with the Middle East conflict. When Israel fights terrorism threatening its very existence, there is one British Medical Journal citation for every 13 Palestinian deaths – this includes the deaths of the very perpetrators of the terrorism. The highly disproportionate and grossly unjustified criticism of Israel is unparallelled when compared to the real and horrific excesses and abuses caused by many rogue nations and movements throughout the globe.

In June 2009, Prof. Oded Abramsky of the department of neurology of the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical College in Jerusalem responded to anti-Israel attacks in the British medical press by way of a letter to the Royal College of Physicians in London titled "Take anti-Israeli politics out of medicine"

A negative consequence of the British medical journals' editorial policies is that the venture into Middle Eastern politics has detracted from the expected objectivity and trustworthiness that we have come to expect from these prestigious scientific journals.

We cannot be complacent about anti-Israel incidents here in Canada – there have been too many recent examples. We observed an attempt to promote a boycott of Israeli scholars working in Canadian universities. We witnessed the anti-Israel policies of Ontario's organized labour movement. We also saw this manifested at Toronto's annual Pride Parade, at which organizers authorized an anti-Israel contingent as part of the parade. What in the world does anti-Israel policies have to do with a parade celebrating gay liberation in Canada? Is this anti-Israel bias political distortion and manipulation or is it something more?

There can be no question that most, if not all, of these attempts to demonize and isolate Israel are manifestations of a campaign designed to reignite virulent anti-Semitism. Whether in Canada or abroad, it would be less disingenuous if the anti-Israel critics had the courage to be honest about their true distorted and hateful attitudes.

The Kirshner File

The makeover of the Alte Synagoge

The fate of Essen's majestic Alte Synagoge, or Old Synagogue, has finally been settled thanks to an Israeli woman who has lived in Germany for most of her adult life. The synagogue, one of Germany's most imposing structures in terms of raw curb appeal, has gone through six distinct phases – firstly as a synagogue, secondly as an anti-Semitic target, thirdly as an air raid shelter, fourthly as a hulking ruin, fifthly as a museum of German resistance to Nazism and sixthly as an industrial design centre.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

In its latest and probably final incarnation, the synagogue on 29 Steelerstrasse will become a museum of Jewish history and culture. It's due to open in 2010, when the Ruhr Valley city Essen – once known for its coal mines and steel and armaments factories – will be the European Union's designated cultural capital.

Consecrated as the New Synagogue in 1913, less than a year before the outbreak of World War I, this mammoth church-like building was hewn from limestone and was universally regarded by its nearly 4,000 congregants as an expression of their confidence of their rightful place in German society.

"German Jews thought that if they assimilated, they would be accepted as equals," said Edna Brocke, the Jerusalem-born director of the 7.8 million-Euro project.

"To their disappointment, they learned that this was not to be," added Brocke, whose parents left Germany a year after Adolf Hitler's rise to power in 1933 and arrived in British Mandate Palestine in 1935.

The Alte Synagoge

Designed by the Christian architect Edmund Korner in consultation with its rabbi, Salomon Samuel, the synagogue was a blend of modern and Oriental sensibilities. By the early 1930s, Essen was home to about 5,000 Jews, some of whom had immigrated to Germany from Poland after 1918.

Brocke, 65, said that the local fire department set the synagogue, next to a Roman Catholic church, on fire on Kristallnacht in November 1938. Severely damaged, its stained-glass windows smashed, it was used for air raid drills and as a bomb shelter during World War II. Despite the heavy Allied bombing raids to which Essen was subjected, the synagogue, miraculously, was never struck. By war's end, when Essen's Jewish population had either fled or been killed, the synagogue's interior lay in utter ruins, a testament to Nazi venality.

Out of respect, the municipality, in 1949, erected a stone sarcophagus in front of its stairway. The bland inscription on it referred to the "more than 2,500 Jews [in Essen] who had to lose their lives between 1933-1945." The text would later be amended to read, "In memory of the more than 2,500 Jews... murdered by the Nazi regime in the years 1933-1945."

Edna Brocke

In 1959, when the revived Jewish community in Essen was but a pale facsimile of its former self, the city, then in West Germany, bought the synagogue. The proceeds enabled the community to build a new shul on the site of its youth centre, which was burned down on Kristallnacht.

Not having decided what to do with the building, one of the most architecturally impressive shuls in the country, the city left it in a state of abandonment before deciding to convert it into the Museum of Industrial Design.

But in transforming it into a purely functional space, the municipality took irresponsible liberties, destroying its original furnishings, including the bimah and its mosaics and ornaments, thus proving that there was precious little awareness of the need to preserve the vestiges of Essen's Jewish heritage.

In 1979, a fire, caused by a short circuit, ravaged the museum, prompting Essen to turn the space into a permanent exhibition, Resistance and Persecution in Essen, 1933-1945. According to Brocke, Jewish victims were viewed as only one of several groups that the Nazis had persecuted.

Meanwhile, Essen started a program under which former Jewish residents were invited to visit their hometown. Their critical comments about the synagogue's altered interior had an effect. The state of North Rhine Westphalia carried out extensive renovations so as to restore its Jewish atmosphere. At Brocke's suggestion, the city mounted a new exhibition, Milestones of Jewish Life, From the Emancipation to the Present, in 1988, just in time to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Brocke, a Hebrew University graduate who married a German scholar specializing in Jewish studies and who has worked in Germany since 1966, was the force behind the city's decision in 1998 to upgrade the exhibition and its subsequent decision in 2008 to remodel the synagogue yet again.

"My mission has been to change the synagogue from a memorial site to an exhibition on Jews," explained Brocke, who has been divorced from her husband since 1995.

When I visited the synagogue, which is a block away from a building housing the German-Arab Society, it looked much like a dusty construction site. But within a year, its ambitious makeover as a place of learning and reflection will be complete. Commenting on the slow pace of work, Brocke said, "I want to open the museum in mid-April next year, but I'm afraid it will take a bit longer."

Essen's newest synagogue, finished in the autumn of 1959, is a 10-minute taxi ride from the Alte Synagoge. A modern, functional building that easily blends in with its surroundings in a leafy middle-class neighbourhood, it serves the mostly 900 Soviet Jews who have registered with the community. On the premises is a Sunday school that, as I discovered, is filled with demonstrative children, low-key adolescents and their parents.

I talked to a variety of people from all walks of life, reflecting the community's diversity.

Yevgeny Budnizkij, a 70-year-old pensioner and former engineer, is from Kiev. He immigrated to Germany 17 years ago. For the past 11 years, he been the community's president. Although he considered the United States as a destination, he chose Germany due to his fluency in German. "I learned German at school," he said. "And Yiddish from my grandmother."

Ursula Schuetze

To him, the greatest challenge confronting the community is inculcating Jewish values and education in Jews who were brought up in an atheistic system and in a nation whose government generally frowned upon and discriminated against its Jewish population.

His contemporary, Yuri Michalovich Radzikovsky, 69, was born in the Caucasus and teaches Russian at the Sunday school. He was content in Russia, but his ethnic German wife could not resist the pull of Germany.

Dennis Eusgeld, 13, has a fairly good command of Jewish knowledge, something his parents cannot claim to possess. Born in nearby Bochum, two years after his family left St. Petersburg, he hopes to be a chemist. Lilya Schwartzman, an 18-year-old native of Moscow, teaches at the Sunday school, but plans to study law. "I feel comfortable in Germany, but my accent identifies me as a foreigner."

Ursula Schuetze, a member of the Jewish Community Council, was the only prewar German Jew I met at the synagogue. Born in 1930 in a village near Berlin, she has resided in Essen since 1958. Since she is half-Jewish and was baptized, she and her Jewish mother were considered "privileged" Jews by the Nazis and thus not deported.

Her maternal grandmother, however, was murdered in Auschwitz, while her Catholic father was imprisoned because he refused to divorce his Jewish wife.

Through adversity, Schuetze, whose daughter lives in Israel, clung to her Jewish consciousness, returning to the Jewish community with Nazi Germany's defeat.

And now she feels thoroughly Jewish.

Rabbi shares his views on the eve of his aliyah

'I think I expressed the Orthodox point of view in a way that I felt was genuine to Orthodox principles while at the same time I hope being understandable and accessible to people who are not Orthodox'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks believes that, in addition to his work as spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah over the past 15 years, he has filled an important role by "engaging in the broader community."

The rabbi, 51, who will make aliyah with his wife, Joyce, in mid-August, said that in the right-wing Orthodox community, there are many people "who would not be comfortable engaging in the broader community, but they haven't begrudged that. They felt it was an important role for someone to do."

A native of Ottawa, where he attended public school as a youngster, the future rabbi was president of his Reform temple youth group and became interested in becoming more observant when he was a student at Carleton University.

He applied and was accepted to law school three times before deciding that he didn't want to spend "the best hours of the day doing something I wasn't that interested in."

Because Kehillat Shaarei Torah is "a very manageable size," with approximately 200 families, Rabbi Tradburks, who was ordained at Yeshiva University 23 years ago, has been able to become involved in the Jewish community at large, with the congregation's support and encouragement, he said.

Referring to the demographics of the synagogue, specifically its high proportion of congregants from South Africa and Montreal, Rabbi Tradburks said, "That's kind of the South African/Montreal/Ottawa view of the rabbinate. The rabbi is a community figure and needs to be involved in a lot of things outside the shul."

Noting that some of his Orthodox colleagues "choose not to" interact with the non-Orthodox community, Rabbi Tradburks said that he had become "somewhat of a spokesperson for the Orthodox community.

"I think I expressed the Orthodox point of view in a way that I felt was genuine to Orthodox principles while at the same time I hope being understandable and accessible to people who are not Orthodox."

As for other Orthodox rabbis whose involvement is limited to the Orthodox community, Rabbi Tradburks said that the Orthodox community is large and has "so many" of its own needs – particularly those related to education and kashrut – that it creates "more than enough urgency" for them to address.

He traces his attitude to his background in Ottawa and Birmingham, Ala., where he served a congregation for seven years before moving back to Canada and joining Kehillat Shaarei Torah. "There's no question there's not the luxury of separatism in a smaller community.

"The Orthodox community in Toronto can function beautifully, as it does, not being so engaged with the broader community, whereas in Ottawa, and certainly in Birmingham, that was impossible. You couldn't have an Orthodox school. You had to have a community school. You had to be involved with the broader community all the time."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

He said living in a smaller community gave him respect for people who were "very passionate Jews" involved in community institutions, but who didn't necessarily have his religious background.

Reflecting on changes in the Toronto Jewish community since he arrived, Rabbi Tradburks said he believes the religiously weak "are getting weaker and the strong are getting stronger."

Numbers are growing in the Orthodox community, and its schools and resources are also strengthening, he said.

"To some extent, I feel that that [Orthodox] community is not recognized as fully by the broader Jewish community for the power and resources it can bring to bear on the general Jewish community."

In the non-Orthodox community, he said, he notes "a weakening of traditional observance.

"I think it goes without saying that there are many tens of thousands of Jews in Toronto whose connection to anything Jewish has pretty much dissipated."

He said it is tragic that the Jewish community has "almost accepted that weakened connection as just part of modern life.

Ritual observance, he added, is "the most effective way of keeping people strongly connected to Judaism.

"The ideal should be helping people and encouraging people to become more fully engaged in religious ritual life, which includes also ethical behaviours and chesed of all sorts."

Reflections from Poland:

One hundred cantors travel to the former heart of European Jewry

By ERIC MOSES

Guest Voice

I had been to Poland before, so I arrived prepared for the beautiful, lush countryside and green parkland. It wasn't the grey, bleak country I had come to expect from all the Holocaust movies I had seen. However, this visit to Poland was different. There seemed to be a renewal of Jewish life and a keen interest in memorializing the past.

Cantor Eric Moses

Throughout the streets of Warsaw, there were plaques commemorating what once was. On a few older apartment buildings, large photos of former Jewish residents taken to their death by the Nazis hung outside the windows. I felt a tingling in my spine as I walked into the Great Nosyk Synagogue in Warsaw for Ma'ariv – a shul where legendary chazzanim and choirs had inspired countless Jewish people who came to pray.

I was surprised to see men in black kapotes and youth with tzitzit coming to daven. Who were they? Surely they had not maintained their Jewish roots throughout 45 years of Communism. Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich, an American, explained: "The Poles are finding their roots. They are finally emerging once again as an autonomous nation after many years of occupation. Those who find a Jewish link in their ancestry are yearning for knowledge and beginning to practise as Jews. They no longer fear the Nazis or the Communists."

During our visit to the National Jewish Theatre of Warsaw, we met with director Golda Tencer. A child of Auschwitz survivors, she was born in Lodz and still lives in Poland. To hear Yiddish spoken on the stage in Warsaw was something I could only have dreamed of. As the founder of the American-Polish-Israeli Shalom Foundation, Golda has given the Jewish Theatre a new lease on life.

Among the foundation's various initiatives are Yiddish-language courses taught in Lodz and Warsaw, the annual Yiddish festival in Warsaw, seminars in Poland's universities and continued support of the Yiddish theatre, which still operates a full season of Yiddish plays, including classic works by Abraham Goldfaden, Mendele Mocher Sforim, Sholom Aleichem and Izchak Leib Peretz. (For further details on the foundation's various initiatives, visit its website at www.shalom.org.pl.)

I have been a kippah-wearing Jew for more than 15 years. I wasn't certain what the correct protocol in Poland would be. During my first moments in Krakow, I saw a fistfight break out on the street. I put my kippah in my pocket and crossed the street. I later decided to put it back on and a cyclist passed me and shouted "Shalom." A tear trickled down my face. Was it fair to blame an entire nation – a new generation – for the sins of the past? I wore my kippah proudly for the remainder of my stay.

The group of 100 cantors with whom I travelled hosted a gala concert at the Warsaw Opera House with the Warsaw Symphony Orchestra. "Who would attend such an event, a cantorial concert in Warsaw?" I asked myself.

An Israeli soldier carries a sefer Torah at the site of the former death camp in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

There was not an empty seat in the more than 2,000-seat concert hall!

Government officials, including Poland's first lady, were in attendance. Was I dreaming? The concert began with a group of Polish children dressed in cute red uniforms enthusiastically singing the Polish national anthem. I was not emotionally prepared for what happened next: the children sang Hatikvah followed by Ani Ma'amin, a song that Jewish men, women and children sang 65 years ago as they marched to their deaths. Those little voices singing our music in our language – I could not suppress the tears.

Did the Polish people really want us back?

Intrigued by Poland's 1,000-year Jewish history, I began reading the statistics provided to us by the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture. The motto of its Jewish Heritage Initiative in Poland is: "Poland's Jewish heritage belongs to all of us. We invite you to join us as we reclaim it."

In prewar Poland, there were 3.5 million Jews. By comparison, there were four million Jews in the United States and 175,000 in British Mandate Palestine.

The most powerful message of my trip was acknowledging that the modern State of Israel was largely built and populated by Holocaust survivors. That was brought to life when we visited Auschwitz-Birkenau.

As we stood between the barracks davening Shacharit, we saw a group of Israeli soldiers in uniform pass. The davening stopped and was replaced by thunderous applause for the brave men and women who defend our Jewish homeland. Later when we arrived at Birkenau, we lined up along the infamous railway tracks and saluted the soldiers carrying a sefer Torah as they passed between us. Imagine the scene: Israeli soldiers in uniform, marching with the Torah on the soil where the Nazis brutalized our people –what a moment of Jewish pride. We are here!

Today, Krakow hosts the largest Jewish music and culture festival in the world. It's held in the old Jewish neighbourhood of Kazimierz. The area is filled with remnants of its Jewish past, including numerous synagogues, cemeteries, Jewish museums and "Jewish" restaurants (although they're only Jewish in name).

Jewish culture appears to be trendy. The closing klezmer concert must have attracted 5,000 to 7,000 people packed like sardines into an open square, with Poles of all ages dancing and drinking in the streets.

Was this their version of Woodstock?

I discovered that the founder of this festival, now in its 19th year, isn't even Jewish. I sat down at one of the bars for a drink to escape the revelry. It was dimly lit and only later did I notice that the tables were old Singer sewing machines, while black hats from another era were hanging on the hat rack and old family photos were still on the walls. This former tailor shop was now a bar with all the memorabilia still intact. It didn't feel right.

After spending one week in Poland, I returned home confused. I have more questions than answers. Jewish people were an integral part of Polish society for 1,000 years. Today, government officials are committed to memorializing Poland's rich Jewish history. American and Israeli institutions and foundations are spearheading the initiative, but there's little doubt that "Jewish is in." There is a revival among Jews looking for their roots and a renaissance among Polish people wanting to bring back something lost during the darkest chapter in human history.

Eric Moses is the cantor of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

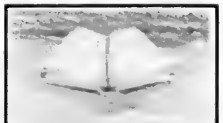
Rioters promote baseless hatred of haredim

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Yes, there is a media double standard when it comes to haredi Jews. That's nothing new.



Rabbinic Reflections

When tens of thousands of haredim demonstrated against a decision by the Jerusalem municipality to open a public parking lot on the Jewish Sabbath, increasing traffic in the heart of the city and disturbing the peace of the day of rest, the main coverage was not of the overwhelming mass of the crowd peacefully standing up for the sanctity of the Sabbath, but rather of the tiny fraction of the crowd that threw rocks, set trash bins aflame and vandalized public property.

But that fraction cannot be ignored by those of us who cringed at, and remain shamed by, its ugly behaviour. The rioters may have been boys, but they were our boys. And if our boys can imagine that acts of destruction and hooliganism are somehow the right way to stand up for the Sabbath's honour – never mind the way to bring non-observant Jews to appreciate the Jewish day of rest – there is much work to be done to teach them what Torah is and what it isn't.

And yes, there are unanswered questions about the arrest of a chassidic mother of a long-hospitalized child on suspicion of having starved him. The media, quoting hospital authorities, said the woman was suffering from a mental illness.

The hospital video footage that authorities said showed the mother removing the child's feeding tube 20 times has yet to be released as of this writing. But why did the hospital not act after the first tube removal? Or the 10th?

If the woman is, in fact, mentally ill, why was a simple restraining order not obtained barring her from contact with the child? Why did the police choose instead to slap handcuffs on the five-months pregnant woman in public, in front of a summoned press, and place her in a jail cell with an accused spouse-killer as a cellmate?

No one knows with any certainty the answers to these questions at this point.

What we do know, however, is that the reaction of some members of her community and some other haredim was horrible abuse of its own sort. To review in any detail even a sampling of the repulsive behaviour in which some religious Jews engaged would only increase the desecration of God's name.

There may have been grounds for protest in Jerusalem – civil protest is a fundamental right in a democracy – but there were no grounds for violence.

That judgment was made unequivocally by, among others, the renowned halachic authority, Rabbi Moshe Sternbuch. Referring to the riotous behaviour, he wrote, "Anyone who commits acts of violence declares that he doesn't belong to our community."

Insulting another is a grave violation of Halachah, as is causing physical harm. Destroying another's property – or communal property, or even one's own property – is also forbidden by the Torah.

How ironic that boorishness and destructiveness should have managed to infiltrate the relatively insular haredi world, a world that stands for diametrically opposite ideals.

At this time of year, after Tisha b'Av, many Jews are still focused on the destruction of the Holy Temples. The Second Temple was destroyed, the Talmud teaches, "because of baseless hatred."

The rioters in Jerusalem may have believed their hatred had ample basis. But whatever their rationalizations, their actions evoked disgust among Jews the world over, some of whom, tragically, will generalize from this example and bear ill will toward haredim as a group.

So, even if the violent protesters believe that they were innocent of baseless hatred, they should be made to confront the fact that they are deeply guilty of promoting it.

Happy with his lot

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Rabbi Yisroel Salanter, the 19th-century ethicist, noted that it takes much more moral strength to be a businessman of integrity than a rabbi. The moral challenges and integrity needed in the rough and tumble of the business world far outweigh those faced by your typical rabbi, who may be shielded from the realities of the business world. While the businessman faces temptation on a daily basis, it's the rare shul where, for example, davening Minchah poses an ethical challenge. Rabbi Salanter then added that those who actually possess such moral strength should enter the rabbinate, thereby greatly enriching the Jewish community.

That businesspeople who meet this test are few and far between is evident on a daily basis. Tragically, the moral lessons of one crisis – if they're ever learned – are quickly forgotten. Even before our current recession has ended, JP Morgan has announced that it will be increasing its risk-taking as it seeks to compete with the likes of Goldman Sachs. It's as if the near-collapse of the financial system, and JP Morgan's own near-demise due to excessive risk-taking, never happened.

The desire for more, more and more is perhaps part of human nature. Due to our unprecedented wealth and the intertwining of the world economy, dealing with the fallout of this insatiable thirst for wealth has taken on greater urgency. The moral failing of someone on Wall or Bay streets has a huge impact on people on Main Street.

Ironically and tragically, the constant desire for increased earnings, irrespective of the actual amount, will never bring us the desired wealth. "Whomever has 100 wants 200" our sages perceptively teach. We have made the tragic mistake of equating monetary wealth with happiness. If wealth is defined by the ability to purchase what we want, then the greater our desires, the poorer we truly are.

I write these words as the shloshim for my father, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, of blessed memory, comes to an end. The tremendous good he was able to accomplish derives in no small measure from one of his favourite teachings, one he practised daily. Ben Zoma, a second-century sage, defines, from a Jewish perspective at least, the meaning of wisdom, strength, wealth and honour. "Who is rich?" he famously asks. The brilliant answer of "Hasamayach bchelko" – he who is happy with his lot, was a model we observed in our home.

Spiritual pursuits were primary. My father would often say that the word asheer, wealth, can be read as an acronym for einayin, sheenayim, yadayim, raglayim – eyes, teeth, hands and feet. If our bodily organs are working properly, we have all that money can buy and then some.

Being samayach bchelko – happy with one's lot – is so very difficult for so many. My father would often explain that the word chelko grammatically can actually mean "his lot," with "his" referring to the lot of someone else, the other person. Who is truly rich? The one who can be happy with what his neighbour has – who feels joy when others do well, even if he is not as fortunate. A person who can attain satisfaction in the success of others will always be happy and truly wealthy. For a religiously sensitive Jew, there is no inherent value in making money. It is but a necessary means to important ends.

As I reflect on the tremendous legacy that my father left for us to emulate, I, together with my sister and brother, feel fortunate to have had as our father someone who lived his life as a samayach bchelko, as one who had joy when he could bring joy (or, when need be, comfort) to others. May his memory be a blessing for us all.

Obama gives Arabs a convenient excuse

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The recent visit to Israel by U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell put substantial media focus on Israel's settlements – specifically, U.S. President Barack Obama's insistence that Israel stop all settlement activity, be it in the West Bank or east Jerusalem.

A Reuters news brief in the National Post ("No settlement freeze agreed on, but good progress made in Middle East talks," July 29) is typical of the coverage: "Mitchell and [Israeli Prime Minister] Benjamin Netanyahu... could not agree on a Jewish settlement freeze in talks yesterday, but said negotiations were advancing. Mr. Mitchell... said he looked forward to continuing discussions with Mr. Netanyahu... and moving toward a 'comprehensive peace' envisioned by the U.S. president.... Mr. Obama's demand that Israel halt settlement building in the occupied West Bank and Arab east Jerusalem has met stiff resistance from Mr. Netanyahu, producing the most serious rift in U.S.-Israeli relations in a decade."

Several Israeli analysts have said that by issuing such a categorical demand, Obama has backed himself into a corner and alienated many people, including among the Israeli left. At the same time, Obama has given Palestinian and Arab leaders a convenient excuse to refuse negotiations until Israel complies with the settlement freeze.

In "Why Won't Obama Talk to Israel?" (New York Times, July 28) Ha'aretz editor-at-large Aluf Benn wrote that Obama's rigid demand has "been interpreted here as political arm-twisting meant to please the Arab street at Israel's expense," which "would seem counterproductive, given the importance the president has placed on resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

Benn noted that Obama "has failed to induce Israel to impose a freeze on settlements. In fact, he has failed even to stir debate about the merits of one... not even the Israeli left, desperate for a new agenda, has adopted Mr. Obama as its icon."

Many Israelis who might favour compromise on settlements including a freeze if conditions for genuine peace negotiations were at hand – resent having Obama tell them they can't build apartments in certain parts of Jerusalem. The CJN's July 30 editorial, "Jews, too, can live in undivided Jerusalem" eloquently placed Israeli expectations in context.

Israelis know that the issue of settlements, while important, is not the major impediment to peace. But the issue has now been given centre stage, distracting attention from the key barriers to a negotiated resolution: the Palestinian/Arab refusal to accept the legitimacy of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people and the insistence that Palestinian refugees have a "right of return" to present-day Israel. Most western journalists now focus only on settlements, ignoring these far more critical and seemingly intractable obstacles.

Perhaps coming to the belated recognition that putting pressure on Israel alone was not a productive move, Obama has tried to prod first the Palestinians and then, when that failed, the surrounding Arab countries to show some flexibility toward Israel as a goodwill gesture. As of this writing, Obama's efforts have been rebuffed.

As Mitchell's trip wound down, Herb Keinon wrote in the Jerusalem Post ("Jerusalem expects gestures from Arab world soon," July 28) that a settlement freeze acceptable by Israel would "have to be met by reciprocal gestures from the Arab world, leading to speculation that the delay in reaching a compromise on the settlements has stemmed in part from difficulties Mitchell has been having in getting any Arab states to commit to any gesture toward Israel at this time."

Not surprisingly, an AFP report ("Saudi rejects Israel recognition without withdrawal," July 29) made it clear Saudi Arabia would make no diplomatic gestures toward Israel while any building activity continued in the areas in question. After all, Obama has demanded no less.

Shaarei Shomayim unveils new 'vision'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An upcoming installation dinner for Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, who became spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last summer, will kick off a $4-million fundraising campaign aimed at realizing the rabbi's vision for the synagogue.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

The dinner, to be held Sept. 10 at Shaarei Shomayim, will feature keynote speaker Richard Joel, president of Yeshiva University, which is commonly referred to as the flagship for modern Orthodoxy for its combination of Torah and secular studies.

Rabbi Strauchler's three-pronged concept for Shaarei Shomayim, which is expected to be phased in over the next few years, will position the shul as a "centre for modern Orthodoxy," he said in an interview. He envisions it as a centre for prayer, study and activism.

"There are a number of elements that we think are very important for creating a vibrant centre for modern Orthodoxy," Shaarei Shomayim's president, Charlene Arje, told The CJN in a separate interview.

Among them are expanded adult education opportunities, which would be facilitated by reconfiguring much of the shul's space to make it more conducive to multiple uses. As well, Arje cited "a davening experience that's very spiritual."

Those aspects would contribute to an experience that would "excite people about being in there, and being part of it," Arje said. Much of it is in place already, she noted.

As a leading modern Orthodox synagogue, Shaarei Shomayim is "such an important institution in Toronto," she said.

Arje, the synagogue's first woman president, said it was "a strong statement" when the board "made it a priority to allow women to be senior officers.

"We want Shaarei Shomayim to be the obvious place where certain [modern Orthodox] things happen," said Arje.

A consultant who was president of Honeywell Canada for five years until 2008, Arje said that despite challenging economic times, "some major upgrades" to Shaarei Shomayim's 50,000-square-foot, 40-year-old building are needed.

Funds raised will be used in part to replace the roof, as well as update the social hall, washrooms and the heating and ventilation systems, Rabbi Strauchler said.

Also, changes are planned in the sanctuary "to align our synagogue with certain values of modern Orthodoxy," he added.

Although final plans have yet to be determined, and membership input is still being sought, the rabbi would like to see men and women be equally "geographically close to what goes on in the synagogue."

He has proposed that the shul have the men's section on one side of the sanctuary and the women's section on the other, with the mechitzah down the middle. Currently, women are seated in two curved sections on either side of the central men's section.

The rabbi also sees Shaarei Shomayim partnering with other modern Orthodox organizations, such as Torah in Motion, which has already held adult education programs at the shul, and Netivot HaTorah Day School, which has a small presence at Shaarei Shomayim in addition to its main facility in Thornhill.

Explaining how Torah study and activism are interrelated, Rabbi Strauchler said, "The crucial piece throughout our history has been the connection to the Torah. To be truly modern Orthodox is to take that Torah and to apply it to the world around us.

"I see the synagogue as a vehicle for doing Hashem's work, together with people who share our values."

The rabbi said he spent his first year at Shaarei Shomayim talking to members and learning what the synagogue means to them, what their dreams and aspirations are, and what makes the shul community "tick," before solidifying his vision.

It's all in the family at Oakville congregation

New education director joins husband at Shaarei-Beth El

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Oakville's Shaarei-Beth El Congregation has a new director of education.

Cheryl Wise has a bachelor of arts in Jewish studies from York University, a master's degree in Jewish education and a family education certificate from Hebrew College in Brookline, Mass. As well, she is certified by the Reform movement as a Reform Jewish educator (RJE).

As it happens, she is also married to Rabbi Stephen Wise, spiritual leader of Shaarei-Beth El, with whom she will be working in her new, part-time position.

Cheryl Wise

A former co-director of education at a religious school in Florida (2006-2007); a director of education and assistant principal at a Manhattan religious school (2001-2005), and a family educator at a congregation in Massachusetts (1999-2000), she also was educational co-ordinator for Birthright Israel at Hebrew University of Jerusalem in the 2000-2001 academic year.

Although Wise's background in Jewish education, and particularly family education, made her a natural candidate for the job at Shaarei-Beth El, she encouraged the synagogue to undertake a national search before she was hired.

She takes over from former educational director Ran Salamon, who will become co-director of attendance and discipline at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan as of Sept. 1.

"Stephen and I see the school and synagogue as being one," said Wise, referring to her husband. Their goal is to create a congregation of learners, where "everybody feels that Jewish education can be fun, engaging and lively for all ages."

Rabbi Wise, like his wife, also has a background in education, and teaches the high schoolers.

A Toronto native who met her husband when they were counsellors at Camp Shalom, Wise said they always dreamed of working together, as they did in New York, when he was a rabbinic intern at her school.

The young couple – Rabbi Wise, 35, and Cheryl, 33, have a five-year-old, a three-year-old, and a two-year-old – are working together to create a new family education program at the Reform congregation, which has 120 member families.

In the last decade or so in Canada, the importance of family education has been increasingly recognized by Jewish schools, Wise said.

"A lot of the values that kids get are from the home," she said. As well, she added, referring to studies she has read, many parents have had negative Jewish educational experiences.

"How can we recreate positive feelings and get the parents on the same page as the kids?" she asked. "Kids have to see that [Jewish education] is important to their parents, too. That can only be done when parents and kids are learning together."

She noted that many American supplementary Jewish schools have moved to family education-only models.

In the past, Shaarei-Beth El has invited parents in for some school programs, Wise said.

Now, she would like to move to more "inclusive" programming that would involve both parents and children, such as a human-size board game with activities related to the curriculum, as well as Shabbat morning programs.

"You have to make sure it's a worthwhile experience for the parents as well," Wise said. "I think there's a lot of opportunity here for growth and to change some of the attitudes people have toward Jewish education."

Wise, who has worked part-time for almost two years at Hamilton's McMaster University writing online curriculum for midwifery, said that she always wanted to go back into Jewish education, but, "living in Oakville [with a Jewish population of just under 1,300], there hasn't been that much opportunity for it."

Rabbi Stephen Wise

Her new position will mark the first time she has worked in a small synagogue, she said.

Living in a small community is very different from living in a centre with multiple Jewish resources, Wise noted. "You can't even get a challah here."

She buys challah, and kosher meat for synagogue barbecues, in Hamilton, which is only about half an hour away by car.

In a small community, the synagogue "truly becomes the centre of Jewish life," she said.

Shaarei-Beth El's school has 60 students from pre-kindergarten through Grade 12. Students in grades 3 through 7 attend twice a week, while others attend once a week.

Intermarriage spurs changes to burial rules

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent and PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The rising tide of intermarriage is forcing Jewish communities across Canada to consider the question of joint burial for interfaith couples.

The rule has been that Jewish cemeteries are for Jewish burial only. But that's beginning to change.

"In the past year, we have set aside a section of our cemetery where interfaith couples can be buried side by side," said June Avivi of Saskatoon's chevra kadisha (burial society).

"It's a concept that is under discussion in many North American Jewish communities."

Avivi said that so far, there has been only one Jewish burial in the designated section.

"He was a member of our congregation, but his spouse wasn't, because she isn't Jewish," Avivi said. "She supported him though."

In Toronto, Temple Sinai has purchased a section of the Lambton Hills Cemetery in the city's west end to permit the burial of interfaith couples. The section will accommodate 130 burial plots and be made available to other congregations whose members cannot be buried together in Jewish-only cemeteries, said Rabbi Michael Dolgin, senior rabbi at Temple Sinai.

The plots will be available to members of recognized congregations and will be offered for sale once the synagogue receives the necessary government permits to operate the cemetery section, he said.

"We look at it as a bridge issue," Rabbi Dolgin said. "I think we, with other congregations, hope it will work as a bridge for five to 10 years to give the community time to come up with space for a new cemetery."

Rabbi Dolgin said efforts to find a solution for couples of mixed marriages began some six to eight years ago, when "in the course of six months, three current members came and sat in my office and said either they or their spouse was expected to die."

They asked if he could do something to ensure they were buried together in a Jewish cemetery. "I had to look at them and say, 'I can't.'"

By-laws at large Jewish cemeteries, such as Pardes Shalom in York Region, which is available to numerous congregations and organizations, restrict burial to Jews, he said.

The Reform movement, Rabbi Dolgin continued, wants "to strengthen the Jewish community by welcoming interfaith families and to provide for them what we provide all our families."

The Jewish tradition requires burial in "land that a person owns" and can be interpreted as being a Jewish section within a wider cemetery, he added.

Rabbi Dolgin said the Temple Sinai cemetery will permit only Jewish clergy to officiate and will not allow the symbols of any other religion on a grave.

The issue in Toronto, so far, seems to be limited to the liberal wings of the Jewish community. Rabbi David Seed, president of the Ontario Region of the Rabbinical Assembly, which represents Conservative rabbis, said "all our synagogues, when they have sections, for example in Pardes Shalom, they would only be for Jews."

Eileen Meyer Renco, chair of the Jewish Funeral Directors of America, said it's not uncommon in the United States to see interfaith couples buried together.

"Each community is so different," she said in a telephone interview from Lexington, Ky. "Most communities have non-sectarian cemeteries, and it's where interfaith couples go."

It would not be unusual in some cemeteries, such as one in nearby Louisville, to see headstones with Stars of David next to headstones with crosses, she said. However, a cemetery in Louisville operated by the local Reform temple is limited to Jewish couples, she added.

Marc Benjamin, vice-president of operations for the Benjamin Group in Toronto, which operates a Jewish funeral chapel, said requests for burial of a non-Jewish spouse "happens all the time, and the reality in Toronto at this point is that there are less than one per cent of Jewish cemeteries with space for mixed-marriage couples."

Benjamin said Duffin Meadows, a non-denominational cemetery in Pickering, east of Toronto, allows for mixed marriage burials, while Elgin Mills Cemetery also has a section that accommodates Jews and their gentile spouses. Both are part of the Mount Pleasant Group of Cemeteries.

Solel Congregation, a Reform synagogue in Mississauga, has purchased a section in the Mount Pleasant Group of Cemeteries for interfaith burials, Rabbi Dolgin said.

In Montreal, Jane Rothstein-Adams, chair of the cemetery committee of Montreal's sole Reform Congregation, the 126-year-old Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, said no mixed-marriage burials are permitted at its section of the Eternal Gardens Cemetery, a Jewish burial ground in the West Island suburb of Beaconsfield. Mixed marriage burials do take place at a Temple Emanu-El section of a non-sectarian cemetery just adjacent to Eternal Gardens, Lakeview Cemetery, which the Temple acquired seven years ago, and at a "very large" section that Temple Emanu-El has at the non-sectarian Mount Royal Cemetery.

"We've had mixed-marriage couples buried there since the mid 1880s," she said.

Rothstein-Adams noted that no Jewish cemetery in Montreal allows mixed-marriage couples to be buried together.

Regina's Jewish community set aside a section in the northeastern part of its cemetery for interfaith couples three years ago. "Intermarried couples were requesting plots," said Joel Wolch, who works part time for the community.

In most other communities, only Reform congregations provide a Jewish burial option for interfaith couples who want to be buried together. Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's Reform congregation (whose membership includes a number of interfaith couples), for example, turned to Chapel Lawn Memorial Gardens, Cremation Centre and Funeral Home in 2004 to provide burial for its members, because Winnipeg's four existing Jewish cemeteries won't bury non-Jews.

Terry Hlady, the Chapel Lawn representative who is responsible for Temple Shalom's burials, said there have been close to 20 burials in the section of Chapel Lawn that was set aside in 2004 for Temple Shalom's burials. She notes that 40 more plots have been purchased by Temple Shalom members.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

Rena Boroditsky, executive director of the Chesed Shel Emes, Winnipeg's community-operated Jewish funeral home, said the Chesed offered to help Temple Shalom establish a chevra kadisha, and some members of the Chesed's burial society expressed willingness to help Temple Shalom with taharah (purification of the body).

So far, said Ruth Livingston, the Reform congregation's president, the synagogue has been unable to enlist enough members to establish its own chevra kadisha.

"We are hoping to have enough volunteers for a chevra kadisha within the year," Livingston said.

At present, bodies for Temple Shalom burials are prepared at Chapel Lawn in the presence of a congregation member.

Ivan Silverman, a member of Ottawa's chevra kadisha, said that Temple Israel, Ottawa's Reform congregation, also recently set aside a section in its cemetery for interfaith couples.

Benjamin noted that Pardes Shalom will open a new cemetery north of Toronto in three or four years. Mixed marriages are likely to increase. "Let's figure out how to address this issue," he said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Israeli red wine has come of age

By YONATAN STERNBERG
Special to The CJN

Over the past 15 years, the Israeli wine industry has seen some dramatic changes.

Once dominated by a handful of large wineries known primarily for producing relatively low quality table and sacramental wines, it's now receiving credit and recognition from wine critics around the world.

In recent years, many new players have joined the local wine industry, with new vineyards and wineries springing up like mushrooms after the rain. While of course these new boutique and medium size wineries definitely deserve credit, "mega" wineries (at least by Israeli standards) such as the Golan Heights Winery, Barkan, Carmel and others are constantly investing time and resources to offer high quality wines, and they're changing wine-drinking habits in Israel.

It's almost impossible to talk about Israeli wines without mentioning the Golan Heights Winery. Best known for its premium Katzrin and Yarden labels, Golan Heights has played an instrumental role in raising international awareness of Israeli wines.

Yarden cabernet sauvignon is probably the closest thing to a safe bet when purchasing Israeli wines. Year after year, this wine has been ranked among the top wines in Israel, and the cab 2004 even made it to the Wine Spectator's top 100 wines in the world list (in its price range of course).

Recently the winery released its 2006 cabernet sauvignon, which while still firm is holding much promise for the future. If you get a chance, don't pass on Yarden's merlot, Ortal Vineyard, 2004. Reflecting 17 months spent in barriques, this full-bodied wine offers layered aromas of dark berry fruits, plums along with hints of herbs and smoky oak, all leading to a long and elegant finish.

Some wine enthusiasts may recall Carmel's Special Reserve 1976, which is considered the first Israeli wine to meet international standards. Some 33 years later, Carmel is still producing fine wines. Some of my favourites include the shiraz Kayoumi, 2003, part of the winery's single vineyard label, and the exclusive Limited Edition 2003 and Limited Edition 2004. The latter is a Bordeaux-style blend usually based on cabernet sauvignon and merlot with varying proportions of cabernet franc and petite verdot.

Barkan has also been busy planting new vineyards, experimenting and consequently producing some fine wines. Barkan's top vinos include wines under the Superieur label, my favourites being the cab '03 and the shiraz '06. The winery's Reserve and Altitude series also include some excellent reds. "Altitude" comprises cabernet sauvignon wines produced from grapes harvested at altitudes ranging from 412 to 720 metres above sea level, providing us with the opportunity to compare and assess the impact of altitude and terroir on the final result.

Carleton U removes alleged shul bomber

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After harsh criticism from Jewish groups, Carleton University last week re-evaluated its decision to employ alleged Paris synagogue bomber Hassan Diab to teach a summer school course this month.

After word spread that the University of Ottawa and Carleton sociology professor – who is currently out on bail after being arrested last fall in connection with the bombing of the Rue Copernic synagogue in Paris in 1980 that killed four people – had been teaching a twice-weekly introductory sociology course at Carleton, Jewish groups called the university's decision "deplorable" and "shocking."

"Canadians should be extremely concerned that an alleged terrorist accused of committing such heinous acts will be teaching our youth at a leading Canadian university," Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice president, said in a July 28 statement.

"We find it deplorable that university officials believe that there is nothing wrong with employing Diab. The safety and security of the community as a whole, and of the Carleton University campus in particular, are of great concern to us."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, expressed similar sentiments, calling the decision to allow Diab to teach "shocking."

"One can only wonder how a reputable university like Carleton can place an alleged murderer at the head of a classroom – teaching and meeting with students. The university should take a cautionary approach until all charges against Diab are cleared," Benlolo said in a statement.

Later on July 28, Carleton announced that it would be replacing Diab, who has taught a similar course before at Carleton, with another instructor.

"In the interest of providing its students with a stable, productive academic environment that is conducive to learning, Carleton University announced today that a full-time faculty member, with direct experience teaching introductory sociology… will immediately replace the current instructor, Hassan Diab," the statement said, adding that the university would not be commenting further on the issue.

Since Diab was granted bail in March, he has been forced to wear an electronic tracking bracelet and is only allowed to leave his home if he goes to work or court, or is in need of emergency medical care. Diab is being supervised by his common-law wife, Rania Tfaily, who is also a professor at Carleton.

His most recent employment emerged in court July 27, when he and Tfaily attended a hearing to decide whether evidence seized by police can be sent to French officials for use in their case.

Diab, 55, is a Lebanese native who became a Canadian citizen in 1993 and has been living in Ottawa with Tfaily since 2006.

Diab was arrested in November by the RCMP after French authorities alleged that he resembled police sketches of the suspected bomber and that his handwriting matched that of the bomber. As well, intelligence sources and former friends said he was a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – the group blamed for the attack – and his Lebanese passport, which he reported stolen, was used to get into France around the time of the bombing, the Ottawa Citizen reported.

Diab is scheduled to appear in court in January to determine whether he will be extradited to France to face charges.

Gaza report will be balanced, UN investigator says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — A United Nations report on Israel's offensive against Hamas in Gaza at the start of the year will be fair, balanced and unbiased, Israel Radio quoted the head of a team of United Nations investigators as saying last week.

Richard Goldstone made the pledge during an interview with Channel 1, in which he noted the report would also deal with the 2006 abduction of Israel Defense Forces soldier Gilad Schalit by Hamas members in Gaza.

Goldstone, a South African judge who prosecuted war crimes in the former Yugoslavia and in Rwanda, added that he had initially declined the UN's request that he lead the investigation, according to Israel Radio.

The judge only agreed to head it after the president of the UN Human Rights Council assured him that the report would be balanced, he said.

In response to a question on why the UN didn't launch a probe into the years of Gaza rocket fire against southern Israel, Goldstone, who is Jewish, said that non-governmental groups had already raised this issue and Israel itself didn't ask the UN Security Council for it.

Judge Richard Goldstone

Goldstone told the TV station that he tried to persuade Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to approve official Israeli co-operation with the committee, but his request was rejected.

The IDF says a total of 1,166 Palestinians were killed in the Gaza operation, the majority of whom were terrorists. Palestinians, however, say that more than 1,400 were killed, including more than 900 civilians.

Israel's stated goals in the war were to halt cross-border rocket fire and destroy the infrastructure of Hamas, the terror group that rules the coastal strip.

The UN team's final report on the Gaza conflict is expected to be released at the end of September.

In related developments, a British media watchdog has called accused prominent mainstream British media outlets of biased reporting in ongoing coverage of the Gaza conflict in January.

The organization Just Journalism says the BBC's website and the Independent newspaper misquoted controversial testimony by Israeli soldiers who were involved in the Gaza offensive. Both organizations reportedly truncated quotes from soldiers, thereby altering the impact and context of their comments.

Such decisions, the group said, "raise concerns about the handling of this source material and whether audiences are being provided with the full facts."

Just Journalism defines itself as "an independent research organization focused on how Israel and Middle East issues are reported in the U.K. media."

The soldiers' testimonies, released in Israel by the organization Breaking the Silence, include allegations that Israeli troops ordered local Gaza residents to go first into houses believed to contain armed fighters. This practice, known in Israel as "neighbour procedure," was banned by Israel's High Court in 2005.

The watchdog also claims the British press charged Israel with committing war crimes in Gaza twice as frequently as similar accusations were levelled against Sri Lankan troops in a conflict taking place at the same time halfway around the world.

"Across the five daily broadsheets, war crimes allegations in relation to Israel were addressed twice as often as war crimes allegations in relation to Sri Lanka," says a report by the group.

IDF: Gaza war was 'proportionate,' defence brief says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel's offensive against Hamas in Gaza at the beginning of the year was a "proportional response" to attacks by the Islamist group, the Foreign Ministry said in a defence brief on Operation Cast Lead released last Thursday.

"Israel's resort to force in the Gaza Operation was both a necessary and a proportionate response to Hamas' attacks," the ministry said in a statement on the brief, which was published ahead of two harsh United Nations reports on the conflict expected to be released.

"While the Israel Defence Forces continue to investigate specific incidents during the operation, the paper demonstrates that Israeli commanders and soldiers were guided by international humanitarian law, including the principles of distinction and proportionality."

The ministry said the brief, titled The Operation in Gaza – Legal and Factual Aspects, also details the context of the campaign.

Chief of Staff
Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi

According to the statement, the brief gives previously unpublished details of multiple Israel Defence Forces investigations into allegations of violations of the law during Operation Cast Lead – the code-name for the three-week offensive – made by various groups.

The paper reveals that IDF investigative teams are currently examining approximately 100 complaints, including 13 criminal investigations opened so far.

A draft of two UN reports is expected to be given to Israel around the end of August, before they are officially presented to the Human Rights Council in mid-September. The reports are expected to be highly critical of the extent of civilian casualties in the Hamas-ruled territory during the operation.

The ministry added: "The paper also gives a detailed account of Israel's humanitarian efforts in the course of the operation, particularly in the face of Hamas attempts to launch attacks during humanitarian pauses to allow aid to reach civilians [and] hijack aid and assistance, and hide within and behind medical and international facilities."

The brief concludes that more than 12,000 rockets and mortars fired by Gaza militants between 2000 and 2008 forced Israel to act. It says Hamas was to blame for civilian casualties by deploying its fighters in neighbourhoods and that Israeli forces destroyed buildings only to protect themselves.

The IDF says that a total of 1,166 Palestinians were killed in the operation, the majority of whom were militants; Palestinians, however, say that more than 1,400 were killed, including over 900 civilians.

A Jerusalem-based research organization, NGO Monitor, hailed the document as a welcome change in the way the Israeli government counters "bias." The group said the brief was a document containing "evidence central to examining the facade of research methodology in more than 500 NGO statements during and after the recent Gaza conflict."

NGO Monitor noted that Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch claimed to have no evidence of Hamas' alleged use of "human shields" in Gaza.

"In contrast, the report quotes Hamas operatives who acknowledged rocket fire from schools and describe incidents in which Hamas activists requested children to wheel carts laden with rockets, in case IDF forces noticed them," the group wrote.

In related developments, commenting publicly for the first time on recent questions regarding military ethics, Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi said that "our camp must be pure."

Ashkenazi was speaking to new Israel Defence Forces recruits at the Tel Hashomer induction base, outside Tel Aviv.

The chief of staff commented for the first time on allegations that the army had used human shields during its Gaza Strip operation this year. "We are not aware of any use of the 'neighbour procedure,'" Ashkenazi said.

The allegations were reported by Breaking the Silence, which collects soldier testimonies.

Ashkenazi said the IDF takes all complaints seriously.

"We appointed special commissions to review the matter and are dealing with complaints. We cannot deal with anonymous complaints without speaking with soldiers themselves, and if the soldier is not willing to say what happened where, then we cannot address it," Ashkenazi said.

"It is important to us that our camp be pure. The IDF acted properly, in accordance with its own spirit and in accordance with international law. There were irregular incidents, and we prosecuted [the suspects]," he said.

The Infantry Corps' Kfir Brigade has been linked to abuses against Palestinian civilians in the West Bank.

Ashkenazi said he views these cases as "exceptions." He praised the brigade's performance, saying that "many civilians in Judea and Samaria owe their security to the brigade."

He characterized as "an exception" an incident involving the brigade's commander who was reprimanded for justifying hitting Palestinian detainees under certain circumstances.

"We are very clear about how we use force, and our message is unified throughout the command," Ashkenazi said.

Battle being waged to preserve Auschwitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

AUSCHWITZ, Poland – A searing and enduring symbol of the Holocaust, the former Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp is crumbling.

Under the impact of the ravages of time, the infamous camp, now a museum that drew 1.3 million visitors last year, is falling apart. Many of its wooden barracks have already succumbed to the elements, leaving only red brick chimneys poking into the sky.

But as Auschwitz-Birkenau moulders away, museum officials have launched a major battle to preserve its vast and eerie complex of barracks, guard towers, gas chambers, crematoria, barbed wire fences and archives.

"Saving Auschwitz-Birkenau means saving the memory of millions who suffered and were bestially murdered," Poland's prime minister, Donald Tusk, said recently.

Rafal Pioro, the museum's deputy director and former head of its preservation department, said that the sprawling camp, set on 190 hectares and listed as a World Heritage site by the United Nations, was not intended to last. "The buildings were meant to be temporary."

A one hour's drive from Krakow, in southwestern Poland, Auschwitz-Birkenau was the largest of six death camps built by the Nazis in this country to exterminate the Jews of Europe. The other camps were Treblinka, Chelmno, Sobibor, Majdanek and Belzec.

Germany opened Auschwitz 1, as it was originally called, on June 15, 1940, nine months after invading Poland and touching off World War II.

Formerly comprising Polish army barracks constructed during World War I, and close to the town of Oswiecim, the camp was initially used to intern Polish resistance fighters and intellectuals, common criminals, homosexuals, Soviet prisoners of war and Jews. The first Jews arrived from Tarnow, Poland.

Although Auschwitz 1 basically functioned as a prison and administrative centre, Zyklon-B, the pesticide used to gas inmates, was first tested here in 1941.

Auschwitz 2, or Birkenau, was erected to ease congestion at Auschwitz 1, which would become the camp's administrative centre. Construction began in the autumn of 1941, several months before the Wannsee conference, where the decision was made to murder European Jewry on a systematic basis.

Birkenau, adjacent to the village of Brzezinka and three kilometres from Auschwitz 1, was nothing less than a killing ground. By the summer of 1943, four crematoria, including the Little Red House and the Little White House, were up and running.

Auschwitz 3, which consisted of more than 30 sub-camps in the immediate vicinity, consisted of foundries, factories and mines. It commenced operations in May 1942, serving as a slave labour camp for I. G. Farben, the German company.

According to historians, 1.1 million people were murdered, or died of starvation and disease, in the Auschwitz-Birkenau complex. Ninety per cent of the victims were Jews.

With the Red Army advancing toward the camp in January 1945, the Nazis blew up the gas chambers to conceal Germany's crimes and evacuated the remaining inmates, forcing them on a death march.

For a while after the war, Auschwitz-Birkenau was a Soviet PoW camp, but in 1947, the Polish government converted Auschwitz 1 and Auschwitz 2 into the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum in honour of the victims of Nazism.

Auschwitz 3 was not incorporated into the museum. Some of its workshops, factories and mines still function.

Since then, the museum has been struggling to preserve the camp, which has been battered by natural erosion, water damage and the inexorable pressure of visitors.

Recognizing that Auschwitz-Birkenau was deteriorating, the museum established a conservation department seven years ago, financed, in part, by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation.

The work of preserving the camp is carried out under the strict supervision of conservation specialists and archeologists. Due to the possible presence of human remains, Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich, exercises rabbinical supervision.

"We've tried to slow down the process of degradation," Pioro said in describing the museum's overarching objective.

The museum has no intention of rebuilding existing facilities, he explained. "We're trying to keep them in the same condition as they were found when the camp was liberated. We want to maintain its authenticity."

In Auschwitz 1, the 57 buildings still standing are generally in good condition, but the crematorium needs to be shored up. Over at Auschwitz 2, which contains more than 90 buildings and 300 ruins, work is proceeding on protecting wooden barracks and the remnants of gas chambers and crematoria 2 and 3.

Nonetheless, 70 per cent of the buildings are in such poor condition that they are closed to the public, Pioro said.

Prior to evacuating the camp, the Nazis managed to destroy the bulk of top secret documents related to prisoner lists, punishment orders, medical experiments and Zyklon-B consignments. Yet a considerable number of documents escaped destruction and are now being digitized. A digital map of the camp has been completed, providing data about the condition of the marshy terrain.

The Polish government has assumed prime responsibility for maintaining the camp, but earlier this year, it launched an international fundraising campaign, resulting in a decision by the European Union to channel nearly $6 million (US) into its coffers.

Pioro estimates that about $64 million will be needed for preservation projects.

He has no doubt that Auschwitz-Birkenau must be saved from decay.

"For me, as a father, it is hard to believe that children were murdered here. The Holocaust was possible because there was no one who said 'No.' My task is to teach young people the consequences of racial hatred. This is our goal and our challenge."

300,000 Jews in West Bank

More than 300,000 Jews live in the West Bank, a new report says. The number of Jewish residents in the West Bank increased 2.3 per cent, to 304,569, from January to June 30, according to a report by the Israel Defense Forces Civil Administration. Most of the growth took place in the haredi communities of Modi'in Illit and Beitar Illit, which had population increases of 4.5 per cent and 3.1 per cent, respectively.

Swine flu vaccinations

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu issued an order last Wednesday for the purchase of swine flu vaccine, just as the health ministry warned that more than 700,000 Israelis are expected to contract the H1N1 virus. Netanyahu met with a Health Ministry task force, after which he decided to order enough vaccines to inoculate every Israeli citizen.

E. Jerusalem project frozen

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has frozen a project for the construction of some 900 apartments in east Jerusalem. The news of the order to freeze the project came a day after he held talks in Jerusalem with U.S. President Barack Obama's special envoy to the Middle East, George Mitchell. Netanyahu has been under tremendous pressure from the United States to freeze all construction in east Jerusalem and the West Bank. According to Channel 10, the houses were to be built in Pisgat Ze'ev.

IDF reviews complaints

The Israeli military is reviewing about 100 complaints accusing soldiers of criminal acts during its military offensive in Gaza. Military police have so far been ordered to investigate 14 of the cases. The military refused to comment. The allegations come from fellow soldiers, Palestinians and non-governmental organizations. The cases are reviewed by the relevant Israel Defence Forces unit and then presented to the Judge Advocate General, who decides whether to open an official criminal investigation. Several solders have already been indicted.

Temple longing

Ninety-seven percent of Israeli adults surveyed know the Jewish date of the Holy Temple's destruction, a survey reported. In addition, two-thirds of Israelis would like to see the Temple rebuilt, according to a Ynet-Gesher survey released last Thursday, on Tisha b'Av. Some 64 per cent of Israeli adults surveyed, including about 47 per cent of secular Israelis, said they would like to see the Temple in Jerusalem rebuilt. Eighty per cent of respondents said they think it's justified to mark an event that happened 2,000 years ago, while 13 per cent said only events related to the modern state of Israel should be marked. The phone survey of 516 Israeli adults has a margin of error of 4.3 per cent.

IDF improve warnings

The Israeli military will give more detailed warnings to Palestinians before launching future air strikes. The more accurate warnings, including information on attack timetables and escape routes, will help residents of the area slated for aerial attack to flee, Ynet reported. The plan was formulated during recent internal hearings on the recent military operation in Gaza. During that operation, more than 200,000 phone calls were made to Palestinian homes in Gaza and thousands of warning brochures were dropped to warn civilians of air strikes.

Arafat's aide convicted

An Israeli military court convicted a former financial aide to the late Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat of financing a boat carrying advanced weapons to Gaza. The court convicted Fuad Shubaki for illegal arms dealing, and for his involvement in the Karine A weapons ship, which was intercepted by the Israeli Navy in January 2002. He was also convicted of funding terror attacks. Shubaki told the Shin Bet security service that the Palestinian Authority financed terror attacks against Israel in part by using tax money transferred from Israel.

Israel to head world's largest R&D initiative

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

JERUSALEM — Israel belongs to the Asian continent, but when it comes to research and development, the United States and Europe seem closer to home. And like most countries operating in today's global village, Israel relies on co-operation with industrial partners from the European Union and the United States to propel its high-tech and biotech products into the world market.

As evidence of its leading role in research and development, Israel has been chosen to head the largest R&D network in the world, Eureka, a pan-European, inter-government initiative that supports European innovation and sees investments of 1.5 billion euros every year.

Since joining the program in 2000, Israel, the only non-European member country, has been among the most active of the 40 members.

In 1985, Eureka was set up as a legal framework within which European companies could collaborate and receive government funding. Thanks to a political push from France and Germany, Israel was granted permission to join Eureka as a full member.

"It's a very unique occasion," Israel Shamay, Israel's national project co-ordinator for Eureka, told Israel21c. However, Shamay, who is with MATIMOP, the Israeli Industry Center for R&D, believes the vote that led to an Israeli representative being chosen to chair the network was an obvious choice, after Israel proved itself as a member country.

"In the last three years, Israel became one of the five most active members in Eureka and had the same number of projects compared to [EU] countries, which are much bigger. Out of nearly 300 new projects initiated by Eureka in 2008, we had 40 with Israeli companies participating in them," Shamay said.

Some of the more successful pairings since Israel joined Eureka are between an Israeli agricultural company, Veterix, and DeLaval, a Swedish milk industry giant. Veterix developed a capsule that sits in the stomach of a cow to monitor the health of the animal from within, and worked with the Swedish firm to co-develop the idea.

"This is an example that reflects the merits of Eureka," Shamay said. "The partner is a prospective business partner. In this case, the Swedish government shared the risk."

Elbit Systems, an Israeli defence industry high-tech firm, has had several projects in Eureka. One was to take cameras intended for military purposes and develop them for the auto industry. If the windshield fogs up, or if there is poor visibility, the camera can still see the road. It's good for truckers, Shamay said.

A third success story is the partnership between Starhome, a Comverse subsidiary in Israel, and Nokia and Alcatel-Lucent to develop a smart home system.

Eureka is the largest joint-project R&D initiative in the world. Its main objectives are to foster R&D joint ventures between corporations, with financial support matched by representative countries.

Germany is now entering the chair position, with Israel to follow. The project maintains a troika system, with three representatives holding chair positions simultaneously — the past, present and future chairs. The name of the Israeli chairperson has not yet been announced.

Shamay is hoping that Israel's upcoming leading role in Eureka will have a positive impact on the country's industrial development.

"Over this period of one year, Israel will determine the agenda of Eureka and can prioritize along with our national interests," he said, pointing out that Israel could initiate new funding schemes for startups and companies, bring more EU investment banks and investors to Israel and expose EU countries to Israel's binational projects, such as the Red Sea-Dead Sea Canal proposed between Israel and Jordan, whose primary objective was to provide desalinated drinking water for the people of the area.

Chief scientist Eli Opper said in an interview with Israel's financial newspaper Globes: "During its year as president of Eureka, Israel will be able to set its agenda, which will enable us to promote important initiatives with European support, such as strengthening R&D in low-technology industries or in other priority fields, such as the life sciences, water technologies and the environment."

Operating in the same way as the Israel-U.S. Binational Industrial Research and Development Foundation (the BIRD Foundation), Eureka has a legal entity – its foundation. The task of the foundation is to select projects that will be eligible for a virtual fund.

"It's not like [there's] a common pot of money, and then the commission selects projects for funding," Shamay said. Eureka is different from BIRD and other joint R&D funds in that "Eureka funding comes from different national programs.

"In our case, [funding comes from] the Office of the Chief Scientist. Eureka provides a platform to initiate this co-operation and provides a legal framework," he explained. "It's important to note it's a national task so we are involving the president of Israel, Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Ministry of Science and the Israel Venture Association. We invite all of them to take part in this opportunity."

Israel has other successful partnerships underway in EU R&D programs, in the EU Seventh Framework Programme for R&D, and in Galileo, a global satellite navigation program.

Yiddish is Toronto writer/translator's deep passion

Language refuses to die, Shirley Kumove says

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Despite rumours of its demise, the Yiddish language is not dead.

It's still the everyday language of many (albeit mostly Orthodox) Jews and popular enough to feature prominently at the biannual Ashkenaz Festival in Toronto and as the focus of the recent Montreal International Yiddish Theatre Festival, which attracted Yiddish speakers and lovers from many countries.

Yiddish is also a deep passion for Toronto native Shirley Kumove, who has received much acclaim for her translations of Yiddish books and sayings into English.

Her foray into the translating game actually came about in an unexpected fashion, she said in an interview with The CJN.

"It started from a negative impulse. Leo Rosten had just published his book on Yiddish quotations, and he translated the word 'mensch' as man. This was incorrect. 'Mensch' means a decent human being and knows no gender. I was infuriated and stomped around the house fuming.

"My husband suggested that I write my own book, since I knew Yiddish well and had been writing sporadically. I took up the challenge. I'd been collecting Yiddish folk sayings for years, and this was the opportune moment to open up my shoebox of index cards and do something about it," Kumove said.

The result was two books of translations – Words Like Arrows: A Collection of Yiddish Folk Sayings (1984) and More Words, More Arrows: A Further Collection of Yiddish Folk Sayings (1999). A third book, Even More Words, More Arrows: A Further Collection of Yiddish Folk Sayings is now in the works.

Words Like Arrows, which like all the books in the series was published in a bilingual edition, won a multiculturalism award from the federal government and an award from the Ontario Arts Council.

She's since garnered praise for Drunk from the Bitter Truth: The Poems of Anna Margolin (2005), which she translated and edited and for which she won the 2007 Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award for Yiddish translation in 2007. It was also the runner-up for the National Jewish Book Award for Poetry in the United States.

Shirley Kumove

Kumove is currently awaiting the release, from SUNY Press, of her translation of Yehoshua Perle's Ordinary Jews (Yidn fun a gants yor), a highly lauded and award-winning coming-of-age novel. It was originally published in 1935 and set in Radom, Poland (the author's birthplace). Kumove considers it an "important novel."

In addition, she contributes to such publications as the Paken Treger, the quarterly magazine of the National Yiddish Book Center, Amherst, Mass., for which she penned a column from 1997 to 2003. She is a member of the committee of the Toronto Jewish Film Society, which shows a Yiddish film or documentary each season, and she speaks at various conferences and to groups in Canada, the United States, England and Israel.

She's also a member of the American Literary Translators Association, which meets annually and "brings together translators from many languages from all parts of the world," she said. "Since Jews have a facility for languages, a good proportion of the translators are Jewish, whether they're translating from Chinese, Persian, Norwegian, or the more usual, French, Italian, German or Spanish."

Kumove's love of Yiddish stems from her childhood. "Even though I was born in Toronto, Yiddish is my first language. My parents were immigrants from Lodz, Poland, and they were involved in the newly founded Yiddish school, the Borochov Shule and Kindergarten, a Labour Zionist school, that's now defunct.

"I was raised in the shule where all education was conducted in the Yiddish language. At home, we spoke Yiddish. It was a natural environment for me – I never questioned it. On the contrary, I loved it. It was vibrant," Kumove said.

So how does she go about translating a Yiddish novel? Does she read the Yiddish book first and take notes or translate as she goes? And how does she decide which books to work on?

"Being an independent translator, I have the luxury of choosing what interests me – whatever attracts my curiosity or is recommended to me by a knowledgeable person. Sometimes, I read the work first, sometimes I translate as I go along," she said.

The energetic and enthusiastic Kumove, who's in her 70s, has no time for those who decree that Yiddish is a dead language, which would also suggest that her translating career may be unnecessary or pointless.

"I've been hearing about the death of Yiddish for a very long time now, but the patient refuses to die. I find the act of translation challenging and exhilarating in equal measure. My difficulty is that native Yiddish speakers are quickly departing the scene, so that when I want to consult on some regional expression, there are fewer people around with whom I can take counsel," she said.

"If I'm discouraged about anything, it's that Jewish Toronto has not seen fit to create a Yiddish resource centre. While I have an extensive Judaica library of my own, it would be helpful to me and to others to have such a resource available. It would be a great tribute to the Yiddish-speaking founders of our community."

Meanwhile, she's embarking on a new direction in her life and work. "For the last two years, I've been engaged in writing my memoirs. I've completed the first book, which takes me from birth to age 16 [and] I'm now embarking on the second volume," she said.

"I started writing this for the sake of my children and grandchildren so that they would understand what growing up in Jewish Toronto was like. It's since expanded to be a voyage of self-discovery."

Young keyboardist is a rising country music star

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

At just 23 years old, keyboardist Dave Cohen is living a life most musicians can only dream of.

He's a member of Juno Award-winning country artist Johnny Reid's band; keyboard player for Canadian singer Amanda Marshall, and has toured alongside Reba McEntire, Tim McGraw, Blue Rodeo, Faith Hill and the Barenaked Ladies, just to name a few.

He's been nominated for two Canadian Country Music Awards for keyboard player of the year; has made television appearances on CMT Central, Canada AM and Johnny Reid Live at Revival, not to mention appearances in a number of music videos.

Ask him how exactly he got to where he is today and Cohen calls it "lucky," but talking to the musician, it is clear that he is responsible for his own success – luck or no luck.

Toronto-born but raised in Calgary, Cohen began playing piano at age five, but he never studied in a conservatory setting. In Grade 10, he joined the PT Junction Blues Authority, a band formed by four other Jewish students. They won their high school's Battle of the Bands competition, and played at numerous Jewish events, as well as at Calgary's Kaos blues bar.

Still, growing up, Cohen didn't plan on becoming a professional musician. It was only in Grade 12, when he was accepted to Humber College's esteemed jazz program in Toronto, that he really started to think about being a professional keyboardist.

During his time at Humber, Cohen joined the band Cavern, and then VanderPark, which is still around today. VanderPark was the most success Cohen had in independent music, opening for groups such as the Spin Doctors and Little Feat, and touring in eastern Canada.

Cohen also began to venture out on his own.

"While other people were doing school, I was downtown meeting people and making friends. There's no science to it," Cohen says about his early success.

"It's meeting people at the right place and the right time, hanging out in bars in Toronto."

He'd play with musicians just for fun, not realizing which artists he had performed with. That was how Cohen got his first major gig, as keyboard player for Marshall.

Marshall's people called out of the blue, says Cohen, and told him they had gotten his name from her drummer.

"I had met him three or four times, and I was totally shocked," he says. "I'd played with him for fun. I couldn't understand why me of all people – in my head, I was listing off 20 other keyboardists in town who were better known than I was and could have done it."

Soon Cohen was playing with Marshall at the 16th International AIDS Conference in Toronto, in front of 55,000 people. He started the show alone with a piano solo. "The biggest crowd I'd ever played with before was about 1,000 or 2,000 people, so I was scared. But you get over it quickly."

Around the same time, in early 2006, Cohen had another breakthrough when he became Reid's keyboardist. After Cohen contacted a number of artists, managers and booking agents in the hope of getting some work, Reid hired him.

"It's beyond me. I wouldn't have hired me if I was them at the time!", Cohen said.

In January 2008, Cohen moved to Nashville because of the opportunities the music capital could offer.

In Nashville, everyone is approachable, he says. For example, Cohen wanted to meet Jimmy Nichols, one of Nashville's busiest keyboardists and music directors.

"His phone number is on his website, so I just called him up and went for coffee," Cohen says. "I just picked his brain."

In an industry that is essentially about "friends hiring friends," having excellent people skills is integral.

"Playing is a yes or no question – the other factors are if you are friendly, can you live in a 45-foot bus with five other people for weeks?"

Cohen attributes his people skills to his summers at the Jewish Camp BB Riback, along the shores of Pine Lake in Alberta.

"Camp BB set me up to have those skills, to live with people you don't know in close quarters. That experience is not something everyone has to fall back on."

Cohen has learned "two truths" from the industry.

"Cellphone bills will always be very, very expensive, and you will always be paying rent for a house that you're not living in," he says, laughing.

Besides his work as a keyboardist, Cohen is also Reid's music director, running rehearsals and "making the band look good."

In Nashville, he plays at showcases for new artists, and he is Canada Musician magazine's new keyboard columnist. As well, Cohen plays other instruments, including organ, drum, accordion, guitar and bass.

He considers himself fortunate to have supportive friends and family.

"My parents have been unbelievably supportive," he says. "They get it – they get that it's a business, and they take it very seriously. You're selling yourself."

One day, Cohen would like to get into producing. He'd love to play with artists such as John Mayer, Bruce Hornsby, and Stevie Wonder. But for now, Cohen is happy to be exactly where he is.

Montreal klezmer sextet moves into world-music territory

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

After a decade of relative obscurity, Sagapool seems to have finally made a new name for itself.

During the process of working with their manager of two years and moving to a new label, the Montreal sextet has found a more mainstream audience since their days underground, garnering critical and commercial recognition for their unique blend of jazz, Gypsy folk, swing, Latin and reggae rhythms and, of course, klezmer.

According to Guillaume Bourque, Sagapool's clarinetist, this also has much to do with the sudden surge in popularity of klezmer-influenced music within the commercial markets. He describes Sagapool's music as "festive, with a lot of explosive energy" running through it, as well as moments of instrumental acoustic improvisation.

Sagapool's most recent album – 2008's Episode Trois – is a considerable leap conceptually from their previous two albums, as it contains only original compositions, as opposed to the mix of original and traditional songs on their 2002 debut Apprenti Moustachu and their followup, 2005's St-Urbain Café. Bourque says that for its latest release, the band concentrated on "taking new avenues and chances with other styles of music."

This change in the band's development is reflected in its name: Episode Trois is the first album in which the band uses the name Sagapool, having formerly been known as Manouche, a French term referring to Gypsy jazz music. Bourque says that they made a conscious decision to rename themselves after straying from the pure manouche roots of their first two albums into more world-music territory. After some deliberation, they settled on Sagapool, a reflection of their decade together as a band.

"This year has been our 10th year together," Bourque says, "so we thought about the word 'saga,' [meaning] a long story, and we thought it was a good word for us. And pool is like a group, a musical group, so we put that together into Sagapool."

Sagapool played a Toronto gig at the Drake Hotel on July 8 as an Ashkenaz Festival presentation. This is the second time the band has played for the festival, having played in the Ashkenaz Festival proper, at Harbourfront Centre, in 2004. Although no one in the band is Jewish (save for former member Daniel Gelinas), Bourque used to live in Outremont – a Montreal borough with a large chassidic community – where he was first introduced to klezmer music. In fact, he had some help from a Jewish resident when he composed one of the Yiddish songs on St-Urbain Café, which Bourque sang on.

"I asked a neighbour to translate the tune and teach me the right pronunciation," he said.

Each of the six members of Sagapool brings his or her own instrumental mastery to the mix to give the music an eclectic flavour, including the use of guitar, double bass, violin, accordion, percussion, clarinet, glockenspiel, banjo and various other instruments. All members have backgrounds in musical theory and performance from renowned academic institutions – Bourque and violinist Zoe Dumais, for instance, met at the Montreal Conservatory of Music.

APRICOTS, A PLAY BY FORMER IDF COMMANDER MISHA SHULMAN, ON STAGE AT FACTORY THEATRE

Misha Shulman, a former Israel Defence Forces commander who has become an off-Broadway regular, has written the play Apricots, which QuipTake Theatre is readying for opening this week in Toronto.

The play is "a dangerously realistic depiction of the state of affairs in the Holy Land, presented in a raucous comedic style." Based on a true story involving a plumber and a farmer, the play portrays "the mutually abusive relationship each side of the conflict has with its own suffering, and challenges its audience to wade into the mess." The quotes come from a QuipTake press release.

The director is Adam Lazarus. Apricots premières at the SummerWorks Theatre Festival, Aug. 6 to 16 at the Factory Theatre Mainstage. Tickets $12 in advance, $10 at the door. www.summerworks.ca

Cabaret Auditions: Studio 5040 Cabarets is holding auditions for cabaret performers in the rehearsal hall of the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. "If you've ever thought about doing this kind of performing, now is your chance – don't be shy," writes artistic director Merle Garbe.

Instructions are to prepare a 10- to 15-minute sampling of your cabaret material, possibly consisting of a combination of songs, humour, storytelling and interacting with the audience. Bring your own accompanist; piano and boom box will be provided. The object is to find performers for future cabaret nights; these engagements come with an honorarium. Auditions are on Monday, Aug. 10, 6 to 10 p.m. 416-733-0558 or e-mail mgarbe@tocentre.com

Names in the News: The Beastie Boys are an American group from New York City widely considered to be one of the most significant and influential hip-hop and punk acts of their era. The band was recently forced to cancel its summer tour dates after Beastie Boy Adam Yauch discovered a small tumour in his salivary gland that proved to be cancerous. He underwent surgery in July and was expected to return to full health. Besides Yauch, the band consists of Michael Diamond, Adam Horovitz and "DJ" Michael Schwartz.

The Corrie Controversy Continues: A scandal has broken out in San Francisco over inclusion of a highly controversial film in that city's acclaimed Jewish Film Festival.

The film, Rachel, investigates the death of anti-Israel activist Rachel Corrie in Israel; Corrie's death under a bulldozer in Gaza in 2003 while protesting a home demolition was also the subject of a strongly anti-Israel play.

The film's inclusion in the festival program, along with the festival's invitation to Corrie's mother, Cindy Corrie, to speak after the July 25th program, generated a storm of angry denunciations, blasts on web blogs, e-mails, protest letters and phone calls. The controversy only worsened after the festival hastily added a pro-Israel speaker to the program at the last minute.

Citing "healthy differences on how to approach sensitive issues," Shana Penn, president of the festival board, resigned as president on July 20, though she continues to sit on the board. The next day festival executive director Peter Stein released a statement apologizing "for not fully considering how upsetting this program might be," but added that the festival stood by its decision to screen the film.

According to JTA, inclusion of the film and Cindy Corrie into the festival "has struck a nerve with some in the Jewish community, who believe the festival crossed a line into overtly anti-Israel propaganda. Some have called for a boycott of the festival, saying Corrie, and now her parents, worked to ostracize and delegitimize Israel."

Two sister foundations, the Koret Foundation and the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture, issued a joint statement denouncing festival organizers for booking the film, inviting Cindy Corrie to speak, and working with "two virulently anti-Israel, anti-Semitic groups."

"Those who cavalierly fling Israel's future into the grasp of those who would destroy it betray a mainstay of the mainstream Jewish community to support Israel and to counteract anti-Israel propaganda events, speakers and organizations," the statement read, in part.

"Though the film festival has faced controversy before, the 'Rachel' debate might mark a new level of vitriol among opposing factions in the Bay Area Jewish community," the JTA story stated, adding: "If the Academy handed out an Oscar for community turmoil, the Rachel Corrie flap at this year's San Francisco Jewish Film Festival would win handily."

UNIQUE TOURIST ATTRACTIONS: She'an Nights, a multimedia nighttime tour of the ancient city of Beit She'an-Scythopolis that opened recently and will run for several months, is an exciting nighttime option for tourists visiting the Beit She'an National Park in the Jordan Valley. This unique project in an archeological site, the fourth-largest such project in the world, offers visitors the opportunity to enjoy the site in the cool night air in a region known for its sweltering summer days. The visit includes a 10-minute presentation on the area's history, followed by a multi-sensory experience walking through the excavated streets, where audiovisual presentations are projected onto dozens of giant screens on the columns, the walls and even the tel behind the site.

In addition, the Night Spectacular at the Tower of David Museum tells the story of Jerusalem in a one-hour blaze of images, characters and sounds projected onto the walls, archeological ruins, bridges and hidden pathways of the ancient citadel. Focusing on motifs connected to the history of the city, its significance and its spirit, the show uses special film techniques and giant sound and lighting systems.

Sunset concerts will take place every Friday in August among the Crusader castle ruins of the Apollonia National Park, pictured here, overlooking the Mediterranean near Herzliya.

Klezmer band influenced by indie rock and pop music

Bourque cites the band Bratch as a musical influence, as well as Gypsy-themed films by Yugoslavian director Emir Kusturica, such as Time of the Gypsies and Black Cat, White Cat. These days, however, Sagapool's influences are a bit more expansive, as Bourque mentions listening to a lot more indie rock and pop music as of late.

Sagapool's touring schedule has been hectic these last few months, as the band has been jostling back and forth between concert venues in Ontario and Quebec (the band was slated to perform at the South By Southwest music festival in Austin, Texas, this past March, but dropped out due to funding issues). While Bourque has noticed a slight difference in audience response depending on whether they're playing for an anglophone or francophone audience, he says the reception is always positive, no matter where they perform.

"We find that in the States, and in Ontario and outside of Quebec, the people are really amazed… they really enjoy the music and it's really fun for us, too," he says.

Though Sagapool is still touring in support of their current album, Bourque offers some clues as to where the band will be moving creatively in the future, but is just cryptic enough to keep fans guessing.

"We want to begin the creative part, to start writing at the end of August, [but] we haven't talked about what direction we want to have," he says.

"I think it's going to be an extension of Episode Trois – I feel like Episode Trois is sort of a midpoint for us, a place where we've asked a lot of questions that we don't really have any answers to. But I think our next album will have more of a straight direction."

Correction

Incorrect information appeared in "Singing for kids is a thrill and a joy for Maggie G." (CJN, July 30). Margot Glatt's Father's Day concert took place at the Mississauga Waterfront Festival, not Dundas Square. Aidan Mason produced and arranged the CD Around the House With Maggie G. He co-wrote six of the songs and helped to re-create the remaining material for the CD. Stephane Deschamps is the original composer of 11 of the other songs but was not involved in this project directly. The CJN apologizes for the errors.

Broadcaster Larry King writes a breezy memoir

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Larry King, the king of the TV celebrity interview, has written his memoirs after a lengthy and varied career in broadcasting

In My Remarkable Journey (Viking Canada), King seems to bare his soul as he recalls his Ukrainian ancestry, his poverty-stricken youth in Brooklyn after his father's untimely death, his eight marriages (yes, eight), his ascent as a broadcaster, his brush with the law and his encounters with the famous and the infamous

It's a breezy, informative book, and King's fans will probably appreciate it as a peephole into his life

Now 75, King, formerly known as Larry Zeiger, was born and bred in Brooklyn, a kid who never went to college but made it big as a media star

His dad, Eddie (Aron), immigrated to the United States in 1923 from the city of Kolomyya in what was then the Austro-Hungarian empire and what is now Ukraine

As King says, he was fortunate to have left: ""Hundreds of Jews in [his] city would be rounded up and executed by the Nazis in 1941. Fourteen thousand more would be sent to the Belzec death camp."

Eddie, the owner of a bar and grill, married Jennie Gitlitz in 1927. He died when King was just nine years old, forcing his wife to go on welfare. "My mother was a great seamstress," he writes. "She would take in dresses to hem from people on the block for a little extra cash."

Despite the adversity, King had a fairly happy childhood

"I couldn't imagine a better place to grow up than Brooklyn in the '40s," he observes in a reference to its small-town atmosphere and camaraderie. "Nobody moved, nobody divorced, and your friends were your friends forever."

King wanted to be a broadcaster, but had to endure the drudgery of dead-end odd jobs before broadcasting finally beckoned

"I had the passion to transmit, and for as long as I could remember people had always said that they loved my voice," he says

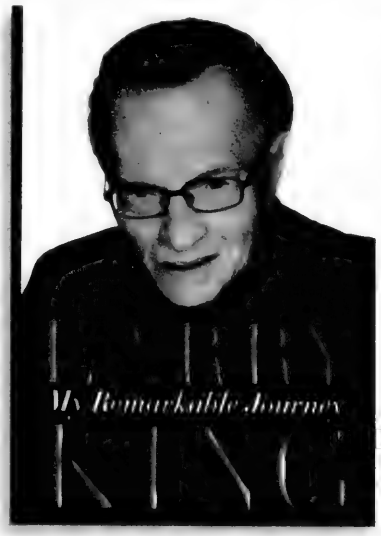
One day, he ran into a CBS Radio staff announcer who had these words of advice for him: "Go down to Miami, kid, and give it a shot. They've got lots of stations. It's easier to get started in Miami."

He arrived in Florida in 1957 with $18 in his pocket and got his big break soon afterward, replacing a morning DJ. The general manager of the station told him he couldn't use his real name on air because it was too ethnic. "You need a better name," he said.

"I was going on the air in five minutes," he writes. "The Miami Herald was spread out on his desk. Face up was a full page for King's Wholesale Liquors. The general manager looked down and said, 'King! How about Larry King.' At that moment, the brand Larry King was created. 'OK,' I said. This was the opportunity of a lifetime. I wasn't going to blow it."

Yet he almost flubbed it. He was so nervous that, for the first time in his life, he was speechless. "The next thing I knew, the general manager was kicking open the door to the control room. 'This is a communications business,' he roared." Shaken by this embarrassing incident, King found his voice at last

He turned out to be so popular that a female caller once asked him out on a date. King's account of his mad dash to her house, and back to the station again, is simply hilarious



King owed some of his success to the Frank Sinatra interview he snagged in 1964. Sinatra never did interviews, but thanks to the intercession of a friend, the temperamental crooner agreed to appear on King's show.

King admits that he has been a spendthrift. "Sometimes, I used to wonder. Where the hell did all that money go? I didn't do drugs. I wasn't a drinker. I wasn't into nightclubs. I just lived beyond my means. I should have owned a Chevy. I drove a Lincoln. A new Lincoln. Every year. There were women. Days at the racetrack."

It would be an understatement to say that he had a thing for women. Instead of bedding them, he married them. "My social life was as out of control as my finances," he acknowledges.

Due to his association with a certain shady figure in Florida, King got into trouble with the law, being charged with grand larceny in 1971. A judge dismissed the case several months later, but by then King was unemployed and under a mountain of debt.

At this low point, he won $8,000 at the racetrack, then acquired a position as a publicist in Louisiana.

In 1977, he received a phone call that, as he says, "changed my life." The Mutual Broadcasting System offered him a job as an all-night national talk show host in Miami.

Several years later, Ted Turner, the proprietor of the newly formed CNN network, came calling.

"I was probably the first major personality who went on the air for Ted," he writes. "At the time, people called CNN the Chicken Noodle Network... I had no idea if CNN would be successful. But I liked Ted and figured it would be fun to go along for the ride."

Describing his broadcasting style, King says he never prepares questions in advance. "I'm in the moment. I guess I have a natural ability to draw people out."

King says that Bill Clinton, the locqacious former president of the United States, has been his best interviewee. He adds that the monosyllabic Hollywood actor Robert Mitchum was his most difficult interview. He rates Nelson Mandela, the South African freedom fighter cum politician, as the most extraordinary person he has met.

He enjoyed interviewing Vladimir Putin when he was Russia's president. "I found Putin very genial. I was most surprised when the subject turned to his favourite place to visit. He was in New York. I asked him if he liked New York. He said it was all right, but not his favourite place. "So I said, 'What's your favourite place? He said, 'Jerusalem.' That shocked me. He used to go there when he was with the KGB."

In closing, King admits that he has a few regrets. Chief among them is his proclivity for matrimony. "I certainly wouldn't have gotten married eight times."

Otherwise, he seems content, his zest for living undiminished. In his will, he has instructed his current wife, a Mormon, not to pull the plug on him if he is ever on life support.

"I agree with Woody Allen. I'm not that afraid of death. I just don't want to be there when it happens."

Canada, China, Israel co-operate on R&D project

Funding for the projects would be "sourced from existing bilateral mechanisms already in place between the countries."

The declaration foresees development of a China-Canada-Israel agricultural co-operation park in Yangling, where the participants would commercialize research projects conducted in each country.

Rothschild said co-operation between the countries marks a significant international development. At the same time, it implicitly acknowledges the leading role Israel plays in technological advances.

"This is the first time the three partners are pulling together in agri-sciences. That reflects well on Israel," he said.

Israel is a proven international leader in a number of advanced technologies, Rothschild said, including nanotechnology, software development and medical research. Today, a multidisciplinary approach is required to advance developments in agriculture.

Henri Rothschild

Rothschild cited Israel's world leadership in nanotechnology, pointing out that one area of promise is the use of the miniature technology to purify and re-use water.

"Scientific advances in material sciences, nanotechnology, intelligent systems and other fields create tremendous opportunities for the agricultural and agri-foods sectors in Canada, China and Israel," Rothschild said. "The novel model of R&D collaboration established today will harness the power of multidisciplinary and multilateral science and technology partnerships to enable the sustainable use of marginal lands, improve the quality of harvested foods and help to free the world from hunger. This is an innovation in itself."

Stockwell Day, Canada's minister of international trade and minister for the Asia Pacific gateway, delivered the event's keynote address. "I marvel at how innovative people facing what looks like, in many cases, insurmountable odds and challenges have come up with solutions that have literally changed the lives of their people," he said.

Contrasting the ancient agricultural practices of China and Israel with Canada, Day said: "Just as China discovered many agricultural breakthroughs and secrets over 4,000 years ago, so has Israel, and we've already heard mention of incredible breakthroughs in a land once virtually barren and now, of course, blossoming in ways beyond imagination."

Those historic agricultural practices "were initially developed in somewhat isolation, and now we have this amazing co-operative venture here – three great nations, three great peoples, among whom have been discoveries that actually are leading to and will continue to lead to breakthroughs in food production, breakthroughs in areas of science and technology, biotechnology," he said.

Rothschild noted that Canada has established a partnership agreement with Israel for co-operation in developing agricultural, environmental research. This agreement "led to the establishment of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation [CIIRDF], which emerged as a template for other Canadian bilateral accords with China, India and Brazil," he said. (CIIRDF was established in 1994 and is funded by the governments of Israel and Canada to promote R&D collaboration.)

"With the new initiative launched by Stockwell Day, China has become a partner in a trilateral approach that brings a powerful new element to the partnership in the vital area of agriculture and agri-foods," Rothschild said.

"The actions defined in the 'Ottawa declaration' will allow Israel to build on its many breakthroughs, including the efficient use of water, the development of marginal lands for productive agriculture, and multidisciplinary advances in computational biology, nanotechnology, material sciences and agricultural biotechnology," said Ilan Chet, chief Israeli delegate and president of the faculty of agriculture at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"This trilateral collaboration will pool Israel's unique expertise and interdisciplinary knowledge with that of Canada and China and apply it to the development of new technology-based solutions for the agriculture and agri-food sector," he added.

Yinliang Yao, chief Chinese delegate and vice-governor of Shaanxis province, said that "the outcomes of this roundtable reinforce China's commitment to the development and commercialization of new agricultural technologies. As Yangling emerges as a global hub for early-stage technologies in agriculture, we look forward to providing our partners in Canada and Israel with a research-intensive site for the development, incubation and demonstrations of these applications, and helping to facilitate access to the growing Chinese market."

ISTP Canada develops and implements R&D programs between Canada and its key trading partners and "is in the position of a technological hub" in bringing the parties together, Rothschild said.

Perfect catch off Kapler hit part of perfect game

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Gabe Kapler enjoyed being part of the magic surrounding Mark Buehrle's recent perfect game, despite the fact it came at his team's expense.

The Tampa Bay Rays right-fielder appeared to have broken up the perfect game with a solid hit leading off the ninth inning. That's when Chicago's DeWayne Wise made a spectacular catch up against the left-field fence, having just entered the game as a defensive replacement.

"I believe it was meant to be for Wise and Buehrle to have those moments," Kapler said. "I was kind of happy for those guys."

Despite an up-and-down year at the plate, the 11-year veteran said his signing with the defending American League champions this past off-season has been a perfect fit. He is in a right-field platoon with Gabe Gross, playing on a winning team and for a great manager in Joe Maddon.

After spending the 2007 season in retirement as manager of Boston's Class A Greenville (South Carolina) team, Kapler hit .301 with eight homers and 38 RBIs upon his return to active duty last year in Milwaukee.

"I learned a lot from my managerial experience. And I wouldn't trade it for anything," said the member of Boston's 2004 World Series championship team.

"I really wanted to come back and play. My body felt healthy and fresh again. I'm glad I did.

"At the end of '06, I still had aspirations of playing, but I was a little bit burnt out and a little bit banged up for sure. It was certainly not a great year for me, coming back from the Achilles tendon injury. I was able to make it through the season, but I didn't feel very good."

Kapler suffered a torn muscle in his right shoulder last fall, keeping him out of the Brewers lineup during the stretch run.

Player agent Paul Cohen went to work after the World Series, securing his client a one-year deal with the Rays for $1,000,018 (US).

Rays general manager Andrew Friedman included "chai" as part of the club's offer, putting a smile on the face of Kapler's Los Angeles-based agent when the fax came through.

The 34-year-old said he was healthy going into spring training, but hit just .150 in 60 Grapefruit League at-bats. He continued to struggle through April and May, before finally breaking out in mid-June.

Kapler endured the most embarrassing moment of his career in the season's second week when he struck out against Yankees outfielder Nick Swisher, who had come on to pitch in a Rays 15-5 romp.

While his batting average dipped to a team-low .173 after a 3-31 slide entering a June series against Washington, his confidence never wavered.

Kapler hit .444 for the month, with four home runs coming in consecutive games in which he played, and 14 RBIs.

Through July 27, he had raised his average on the season to .244, with four homers and 23 knocked in. He was hitting .297 against southpaws but had just four hits in 36 at-bats against right-handed pitching.

Iranian swimmer refuses to race against Israeli

JERUSALEM — An Iranian swimmer refused to race against an Israeli competitor at the recent World Championships in Rome.

Mohammad Alirezaei would not compete in his heat of the men's 50-metre breaststroke since it would mean getting into the pool with Israeli swimmer Mickey Malul.

In the 2008 Beijing Olympics, Alirezaei withdrew from the men's 100-metre breaststroke event rather than swim against Israeli Tom Beeri.

At the time, Iranian team officials claimed Alirezaei became ill before the event and was taken to a hospital. Media reports suggested, however, that Alirezaei was ordered by Iranian authorities to withdraw from the competition to avoid swimming against an Israeli.

A similar incident took place at the 2004 Athens Olympics when Iranian judoka Arash Miresmaili, the favourite for the gold medal, was disqualified because he was over the allowable weight limit in his class. Speculation at the time suggested he deliberately sought disqualification to avoid fighting Israeli competitor Ehud Vaks in the first round.

Inside Back

A person's essence

By MICHAEL GORDON

In a weekly seminar with medical trainees, a resident reported on a difficult case

"The patient was admitted to our acute care unit from the residence with many medical problems. Soon after admission, she complained of chest pain. She'd had previous bypass surgery and was followed by a community cardiologist

"After she was examined and given a dose of nitroglycerin, which helped for a couple of hours, she complained again of chest pain and again responded to nitroglycerin tablets and spray. The nurses suggested I call the son, who, they said, was very involved and often quite 'forceful.'

The Senior Side of Life

"I checked her medications and discussed the situation with the attending physician. By morning, she felt a bit better. The total review of the medications she had been taking revealed that some could be interfering with optimal control of her angina and others seemed to excessively lower her blood pressure. We adjusted those, and by later in the day, she was much more comfortable."

The next day, the son was visiting and learned of the medication changes that had been made. Even though his mother seemed better, he became upset with the medical resident who had adjusted the medications with the attending physician.

The resident told the seminar group that the son lambasted him for making such changes without first speaking to the son, and for listening to his mother, who he said was not really knowledgeable about her medications.

The son also said that his mother had seen the cardiologist a few months earlier, and he asked, "Who are you to change her medications without conferring with [the cardiologist] who has looked after her for a number of years."

The resident apologized for not informing the son sooner of the changes. He tried to explain that on the night the mother was complaining, he was concerned about her symptoms, and since the changes were in drugs she was already on, and they were not changing to new or potentially dangerous medications, he felt comfortable in making the changes. Also he had discussed the decision with the attending physician, the medical specialist who was responsible for that unit. The resident indicated that with the changes in the medication, the mother was feeling better, her blood pressure was controlled and the abnormal laboratory findings were returning to better levels.

The son was still not happy with what had happened because the cardiologist had not been contacted before any changes were made, and over the next few days, the medical resident tried to contact the cardiologist, leaving several messages. The patient improved and returned to her residence.

It is important for families to understand that the duties of physicians working in hospitals include making decisions based on the best information they have, especially in urgent situations. Getting more information is always useful but may not always be possible.

External physicians are not necessarily in a position to decide on what is going on during a hospitalization. Most importantly, if a family believes an external physician must be involved, they should help communicate with that physician to alert them to the fact of the hospitalization and request that they help by communicating with the hospital physicians in a timely and supportive fashion.

If this cannot be arranged, it might be impossible to involve an external physician effectively in immediate clinical decisions, especially if they are deemed urgent.

The Jewish People: united in shame

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The Jewish community with its gross fragmentation along religious, political and, in fact, most lines, is really a community united in our hearts and minds.

How do I know this?

URBAN WRITER

The Jewish world is humiliated by the Bernie Madoff scam and now the money-laundering and corruption scandal in New York and New Jersey. We are united in shame.

One only has to speak with secular humanist Jews or to right-wing haredi community members to uncover a great sense of disgust, embarrassment and humiliation they are feeling because of the actions of these individuals.

Some people have told me that Madoff has brought great dishonour to them and our community through his rotten Ponzi scheme, one that caused some seniors to leave their old-age homes and students to withdraw from college, and some people to return to work after years of retirement. His abominable transgression caused death. He must have loved money.

I have heard from some Jews that they feel physically sickened by the media pictures they viewed of handcuffed rabbis from the New Jersey Syrian Jewish community involved in the money-laundering caper. They said they preferred not to talk about it, as if their child had been arrested for peddling heroin. I have been told by community members of their existential stomach aches caused by the terribly sad reality that "religious people" bought and sold illegal body parts from the remains of our Israeli brothers and sisters. Those pedlars must have cherished money.

These situations simply stink. The fumes of shame and dishonour can be smelled in the vast majority of Jewish homes regardless of their denomination or relationship to Torah.

By happenstance but thoroughly, Madoff and the money launderers have undraped a powerful bond of unity among the Jewish people, one normally reserved for times of intense anti-Semitism.

There is a concept in Judaism called chillul HaShem, literally meaning a desecrating of God's name. A chillul HaShem can be created by an action that puts our people in a bad light in the eyes of the rest of the world. If one wears a kippah and pushes other passengers on the bus they are riding, that is a chillul HaShem.

Multiply that by tens of thousands and you will understand the level of chillul HaShem Madoff and the body-part dealers have created.

Interestingly, these chillul HaShem present the Jewish people with a timely and crucial challenge, one that can only be dealt with through unity. How are we as a people to fix our reputation? This is a huge issue, first because we are citizens of the world and required to be respectful; secondly because a Jewish community with a perceived low moral standard has fewer tools to use for protection.

The greatest question, however, is, how do we rekindle a standard of holiness among ourselves for ourselves? Obviously, there is greatness and sanctity in the Syrian Jewish community as well as the other communities these thieves were allowed to prosper in, but what of the immoral and gross character and activities of so many others? How do we fix this?

Where has our holiness gone? Where are our own expectations of ourselves as honest, ethical and good people? Where has the consecrated Israel gone? It is not gone. But it is hiding.

It is time for Judaism and the Jewish people to hunger for something loftier than materialism and smash that idol called money. Until then, we will be red-faced for a while and keep a low Jewish profile.

The good news is that we are indeed one people. United we stand… in shame!

Israeli, U.S. intelligence diverges on Iran

JTA

NEW YORK — Iran will reach the nuclear threshold by the end of the year, Israel's military intelligence chief says

Brig.-Gen. Yossi Baidatz, speaking last week to the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, said that by late 2009, the Islamic Republic will have reached the point where obtaining a nuclear weapon will hinge on the decision of its leadership, the Jerusalem Post reported, citing Israel Radio.

Baidatz said he believed the international community has come to terms with a nuclear Iran

In a related development, the London Times reported Monday that Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has not yet decided whether to give the go-ahead to build a nuclear weapon.

In a clear contradiction of the Israeli intelligence report, U.S. intelligence sources in Washington later in the week reported that Iran will not have the capacity to produce highly enriched uranium until 2013 and has yet to decide to produce a bomb.

The assessment appears in answers provided in April by the director for U.S. national intelligence, Dennis Blair, in response to congressional inquiries. The document was declassified this week through the efforts of the Federation of American Scientists strategic security program's secrecy project, which works to make available government documents that relate to world security challenges.

Is late 2009 or 2013 the point of no return?

Blair said that in 2007 and 2008, Iran made "significant progress" in installing and operating centrifuges, but the country will not have the capacity to enrich uranium to levels necessary for a nuclear device before 2013. Blair also noted that one of the intelligence agencies, the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, "assesses that Iran is unlikely" to decided to produce highly enriched uranium "at least as long as international scrutiny and pressure persist."

Iran remains a threat to regional stability because of its backing for radical groups like Hezbollah and Hamas, Blair said, adding that the anti-Israel terrorist groups are "integral" to Iran's "efforts to build influence in the Middle East and challenge Israeli and western influence in the region."

Iran has provided Hezbollah with "significant amounts of funding, training and weapons" since its 2006 war with Israel and has also bolstered Hamas' strike capability in recent years.

Blair said Hamas and Hezbollah appear unlikely in the short term to relaunch attacks on Israel, since such attacks would corrode their popular support because of the prospect of retaliation.

Nonetheless, Hezbollah "remains the most technically capable terrorist group in the world" and would attack U.S. interests "should it perceive a direct U.S. threat to the group's survival, leadership, or infrastructure, or to Iran," Blair said.

A MOURNFUL SOLIDARITY RALLY

More than 20,000 people gathered Saturday night at Rabin Square in Tel Aviv to express their indignation at the shootings at a Tel Aviv centre for gay and lesbian youth on Aug. 1. A masked gunman killed two people and injured 15 others, four of them seriously. Israeli President Shimon Peres told the assembly that "the person who pointed a pistol barrel at Nir Katz and Liz Trobishi [the two people killed] pointed it at all of you, all of us, at me." The young girl holds a sign that invokes one of the Ten Commandments: "Thou shall not kill."

The News in Brief

Canada

Crime Reports Drop

TORONTO — Hate crimes against Jews reported to police in York Region north of Toronto dropped last year. York Regional Police received 22 such reports in 2008, compared to 24 in 2007. A Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson told Yorkregion.com that the small drop doesn't necessarily indicate a downward trend. Overall, the police force's 16-member hate unit investigated 80 reported cases of hate-motivated crime compared to 74 in 2007, an increase of eight per cent.

Cdn. Fellows Named

TORONTO — Five Canadians – all from Toronto – have each received one of 20 prestigious Wexner Fellowships for graduate work in Jewish studies. The awards are worth up to $20,000 (US) a year for three years. Nehama Libman (studying at Tufts University), Mordecai Walfish (New York University), Daniel Held (the Jewish Theological Seminary) and Rafi Cashman (the University of Toronto) have been named Wexner Fellows. Davison Scholars in Jewish education, while Rafi Herman will study Jewish history at the University of Pennsylvania. The Wexner Foundation introduced the fellowship in 1988 to develop promising North American Jewish leaders through graduate training, mentoring and specialized programming.

Graffiti Investigated

MONTREAL — Police in Cote St. Luc were seeking the public's help last week after a rash of swastika daubings over the last few weeks, mostly in Cote St. Luc – including four on July 30 alone – on both public and private property, in chalk and painted, sometimes with the swastika backward. Police said the perpetrators could be charged with vandalism or with breaking a local anti-graffiti bylaw.

Firebomber Denied Early Parole

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress said it's "satisfied" by the National Parole Board's July 29 rejection of firebomber Omar Bulphred's bid for early release, but it also stressed his sentence wasn't severe enough.

"The decision reinforces our position on the original sentencing," QJC president Adam Atlas told The CJN.

In February, Atlas said Congress was "disappointed" that Bulphred was sentenced to only seven years in jail for the September 2006 firebombing of the Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef School in Outremont and for detonating a small explosive device the following April at the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre.

Bulphred, now 23, was able to apply for early parole only a few months after his sentencing because his time served in custody counted for more than half his sentence.

The board said the Algerian-born Bulphred had become "scarier" while in jail. It said he wrote about fantasy killings and dismemberment, and that he discussed the "ecstasy" of murder, the École Polytechnique de Montréal and Dawson College shootings, and terrorism.

Bulphred was said to see himself acting for the cause of radical Islam, although there's no proof of him being linked to an Islamist group. The board also said he tried to assault a guard with a pointed stick while in custody.

It said he'd be a "high risk" to re-offend if released early.

His accomplice, Azim Ibragimov, got a four-year sentence for the same crimes after pleading guilty, but Bulphred is said to have planned the attacks. When sentenced, Bulphred offered his "sincerest apology" for his "cowardly" acts, but Atlas said he doubted his sincerity.

Matzah Ball Record

NEW YORK — The world's largest-ever matzah ball was unveiled in New York last week as part of PR for an Oct. 18 basketball game between Maccabi Tel Aviv and the NBA's New York Knicks. The 267-pound colossus was slow-boiled for two days in New Jersey in a 100-gallon kettle. Game proceeds will benefit Migdal Ohr, Israel's largest orphanage.

Oxfam Denies Split

NEW YORK — Oxfam International is denying a report it cut ties with a Sex and the City star because she endorses an Israeli firm that operates in the West Bank. The New York Post reported that Kristin Davis is no longer an Oxfam spokesperson because she does ads for Ahava cosmetics, which makes its products in the Mitzpe Shalem settlement. An Oxfam spokesperson said, however, that Davis and Oxfam haven't cut ties but are figuring out how to handle what could become a "distraction" from the work of Oxfam, which has advocated against settlements in the past.

United Church proposals elicit wide condemnation

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Anti-Israel resolutions being considered by the United Church of Canada at its 40th General Council in Kelowna, B.C., this week have elicited a rash of condemnations from Jewish groups across the country.

The council is the church's foremost decision-making conference. It began on Sunday, Aug. 9 and concludes this Saturday.

As the community anticipates the results of the church's vote on the offending proposals – including a resolution calling for a "comprehensive boycott of Israeli academic and cultural institutions" – pro-Israel advocacy organizations have been urging the church to reject them outright.

Discussion of the resolutions was scheduled to occur late in the afternoon on Tuesday, Aug. 11, with possible carry-over and final voting on Thursday, Aug. 13. As of The CJN's deadline, it was unclear on which day the proposed Israel boycott motion vote would occur, a church spokesperson said.

Last week, Canadian Jewish Congress sent an information package to the church explaining why the proposals and their support material are deeply troublesome to the Jewish community.

Bernie Farber

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

The detailed, six-page letter repudiates assertions found in the resolutions' companion support material – much of which was drafted by members of its Toronto Conference Holy Land Awareness and Action subcommittee – which claims, among other things, that "Israel was built mainly on land ethnically cleansed of its Palestinian owners" and that Israel's Operation Cast Lead was an "assault on the population of Gaza… a visible reminder of the ongoing Israeli regime of exclusion, violence and dehumanization directed against Palestinians, in violation of international law and human rights standards."

Congress called the claims "egregious," "baseless" and in the case of its critique of Operation Cast Lead, "breathtaking" in its "de-contextualization of the Gaza incursion."

The letter was circulated to all church commissioners prior to the start of the general council, according to a church spokesperson.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber is attending the council, accompanied by the organization's immediate past co-president, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas.

Rabbi Bulka was invited by the church to speak prior to voting about the views of the Jewish community and the impact of the proposed resolutions, he said.

The church has also invited representatives from the Canadian Muslim community to speak at the council.

"My message to [the church] is not to let the fringe members take over," Rabbi Bulka told The CJN late last week. "Israel will survive [any resolution passed against it], the question is whether the United Church of Canada will survive this? If you want to align yourself with the forces of hate… this is going to define you. And God help any religion that defines itself this way."

The moderates' 'time-out'

From the editor's desk...

Last week, the Fatah party of Mahmoud Abbas held a large-scale congress in Bethlehem

It was the first such massive gathering of the party in 20 years – billed as a meeting of renewal, reform and intra-factional reconciliation. More than 2,000 delegates from all over the Arab world attended

Alas, the congress failed miserably, and perhaps catastrophically, to live up to its billing.

Nothing in Fatah has changed

There was no renewal: the same prevaricating leaders still rule. There was no reform: the methods of enacting the laws and of enforcing them remain in the same hands. Nor was there any intra-factional reconciliation. Indeed, Hamas and Fatah detest each other as deeply and as permanently as ever. Hamas even refused some 400 Fatah delegates from Gaza permission to attend the Bethlehem gathering.

The result of the meeting must have been a deep letdown for the Palestinians, a suffocating, despairing feeling that the trademark corruption of Fatah will continue to be the norm of their gloomy, disconsolate lives.

But what are thoughtful, reasonable people, yearners for peace in the Middle East, and especially the Israelis, to take away from the Fatah forum?

Not much more than a sad, disappointing sense of déjà vu, and yet again, missed opportunity.

Jibril Rajoub, the former head of the Palestinian Authority's internal security and one of the leading contenders to replace Abbas for the leadership of Fatah, quite openly and directly told delegates that armed struggle against Israel is still an option.

As reported by JTA, Rajoub told reporters that "Fatah will never give up on the armed struggle until we get our state. Until then, this is just a time-out for tactical reasons."

Abbas himself said that "resistance, consistent with international law, is a Palestinian right." He was coy and careful, however, not to define the term resistance, although it does not require too far a stretch of the mind to concede that his audience understood one meaning and one meaning only for the term "resistance," namely armed struggle in all its bloody forms

Indeed, former Palestinian Authority prime minister Abu Ala (Ahmed Qureia) effusively praised suicide bombers who killed dozens of Israelis

Barry Rubin, the Israeli-based Middle East analyst, incisively observed after the Fatah gathering that "the idea which still underpins Fatah, PLO and PA thinking is to demand everything they want, to back that up with intransigence, and if they don't get it, to resort to violence. Missing are all the other tools of international negotiations: compromise, trading off, confidence-building, recognition of the other side's humanity and interests.

"Palestinian martyrdom and suffering is [sic] seen as a winning card because it will bring in international support."

The very vocal anti-Israel rhetoric after the war against Hamas in Gaza confirms this

But Rubin reserved his most pessimistic observations about Fatah for its leaders' approach to the next generations.

"A whole Palestinian generation is being raised and systematically taught to hate Israelis and to believe that killing them is heroic and necessary.

"The total lack of peace education and empathy isn't devastating just because it is something nice to do, but because it builds constituency. Palestinian leaders know that if they were ever to make the compromises needed to achieve peace, they would be denounced as traitors, deposed, or killed. Every Palestinian politician and warlord is ready to use militancy, not ability to deliver a better life for Palestinians, as their main asset."

Rubin's words were a chilling echo of the observations recently conveyed to audiences in Toronto and Montreal by the veteran Israeli Arab-Muslim journalist Khaled Abu Toameh.

"Mahmoud Abbas is a total failure," Toameh emphatically told reporters and journalists. "Yasser Arafat raised an entire generation that glorifies suicide bombing and incitement against Israel and Jews. Abbas is doing the same thing.

"Palestinians must be told to clean up their act. They must install good government, stop crime and thuggery, and bring order on the Palestinian side," Toameh said.

"The real obstacle to peace today," Toameh warned, "is the fact that there is no partner for peace, there is no government on the Palestinian side."

Nothing that transpired at last week's Fatah congress will change Toameh's rather dire view of the future. Fatah is still the corrupt and inept governing group that is less popular, according to Toameh, than the thugs and bullies of Hamas.

Finally, it should also be noted, Fatah reiterated that it would never recognize Israel as a Jewish state and that, oh yes, Israel killed Yasser Arafat.

Fatah is considered the moderate faction of the Palestinian people's struggle for independence. But these moderates, Jibril Rajoub reminded us, are only taking "a time-out" from its armed struggle against the Jewish state.

These same moderates, we remind our readers, betray their own people even as they trouble the Israelis. –MBD

Show goes on without Koffler; funding not affected

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Funding provided by the Toronto Arts Council to the Koffler Centre of the Arts is secure for the coming year following a controversy in the spring when the centre disassociated itself from an exhibit about the history of Kensington Market over the artist's public statements on Israel.

Lori Starr

Reena Katz's exhibit, each hand as they are called, will be mounted this October in Kensington, approximately five months later than planned and in a modified form.

The centre had made plans to co-sponsor the 33-year-old Toronto artist's exhibit along with the local arts festival Luminato, but plans changed after Koffler's executive director Lori Starr saw Katz's Facebook page, which shows her membership in the social networking website's groups Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, Oppose the Motion to Condemn Israeli Apartheid Week, and "No Place for Israeli Products Here" Campaign.

The Koffler Centre, which had provided $20,000 to the exhibit, didn't pull out of Katz's project financially.

Baycrest, whose seniors were integral to the exhibit's interactive component, withdrew its support of the project. The current project will not include that component.

In a public letter to the community (which was online at kofflerarts.org at the time), Starr said that Israel's "well-being and existence as a Jewish state is a core value" of the centre. "No organization could be expected to partner with an individual who actively works against one of its core values."

Fallout included questions about the centre's continued public funding, particularly from the Toronto Arts Council (TAC), which gives the Koffler Centre $50,000 a year — just under half of Koffler's government funding — for operating costs. It also receives funding from the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council, but most of its $1.5-million operating budget comes from donors, patrons and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Last week, Claire Hopkinson, executive director of the TAC, told The CJN that "the issue that we had before us has now been satisfactorily resolved."

Hopkinson added: "One of our roles is that of mentor. When issues come up, as they do for many clients, our first recourse is to work with them ... to talk to them, and then to request of them if they're in non-compliance [with City of Toronto policies, including human rights and non-discrimination], that they rectify that."

Hopkinson said that the TAC has had "great conversations" with the Koffler Centre, Katz and each hand curator Kim Simon. The content of their discussions was confidential, she added.

Efforts to reach Starr for comment were unsuccessful, but last week, the Koffler Centre released a statement expressing its pleasure "that the TAC affirmed the Koffler's right to choose with whom it partners."

Iacobucci to review Israel conference

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University president Mamdouh Shoukri has commissioned former Supreme Court of Canada judge Frank Iacobucci to review the recent York-sponsored conference on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The three-day conference, held in June and called "Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace," drew criticism and protests from Jewish groups, who said the conference promoted a one-state solution to the conflict, which would spell the end of a Jewish state.

According to a statement by Shoukri late last month, the conference "stimulated a useful dialogue about the need to protect academic freedom and clarify the principles underlying that freedom."

He added that York will continue to hold conferences that deal with controversial issues, but will take this "opportunity to reflect on our experience and identify useful lessons for the future."

Shoukri said he asked Iacobucci, who is also a former provost and past president of the University of Toronto, to advise him on what should be expected of university administrators when dealing with York-sponsored conferences and offer recommendations on successful planning and execution of such events.

Iacobucci's report, due by the end of November, will be made public, and Shoukri encouraged members of the community to submit suggestions to iacobucc@yorku.ca.

Ulpana grad spends summer doing cancer research

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Toronto-native Tirtza Spiegel is one of 10 Yeshiva University (YU) undergraduate students who spent the last two months working alongside top scientific researchers at YU's Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York.

Spiegel was a participant in the Roth Scholars Program, a summer undergraduate research program that provided each student with a stipend and campus housing.

The 21-year-old is entering her third year as a biology major in the Samuel Abrams honours program in YU's Stern College for Women.

Before that, Spiegel grew up in Toronto, getting a Jewish education at Eitz Chaim Day School. She spent her high school years at Ulpanat Orot and studied at an Israeli yeshiva for one year.

As a YU student, Spiegel was happy to spend more than eight weeks of her summer working with Dr. Jeffrey Segall, a professor in the department of anatomy and structural biology, and attending lectures to hone her skills as a researcher.

"There were lectures on different types of research, how to be an effective scientist, future career guidance," Spiegel said.

In the lab, working under the mentorship of an MD/PhD student at YU's medical school, Spiegel has been designing primers, strands of nucleic acid that serve as starting points for DNA replication, a process that occurs in all living organisms, to copy their DNA using existing DNA as a template for new strands. The primers will be used to determine the changes in cancer cells in mice.

"We've been studying metastases, so what I've been doing is that I've been designing primers… that will be used to detect genes that regulate metastases," she said.

Tirtza Spiegel

"Metastasis is when cancer spreads to other parts of the body, so basically it is the cause of 90 per cent of tumour deaths. What we're looking at is regulators of metastases, because if we can find that, it will be easier to fight cancer and to [contain] a cancer."

She added that 28 different genes, which were correlated with patient survival in breast cancer in three clinical breast cancer studies, were chosen to be tested for their ability to regulate tumour growth.

"What surprised me is that there is so much that we don't know. It is incredible, it's fascinating, it's so interesting, and there is so much out there that is in our hands to try to discover," Spiegel said.

"It's humbling, because there is so much you don't know. In a way it's overwhelming, but it makes you want to try your best and to do what you can. It is a lot of self-discipline and a lot of picking yourself up when things don't work out the way you planned and you're not getting the results you wanted."

She said that the program has taught her to "think outside the box and think like a scientist, which is a critical research skill."

Spiegel said she's thrilled she was given the opportunity to get hands-on experience in the lab.

"It's nice, because I've done clinical research, and now I'm seeing the lab aspect of it…

"Now I'm given tools for future research… There is so much you can do with it, and there is unlimited potential we have to help others. There is so much promise."

Spiegel said she was grateful to her mentor and to Segall for "their incredible help and guidance through this summer and for their support."

At just 21 years old, Spiegel said she isn't sure yet where her studies will lead her, but she's certain she'll continue her education and use her skills to help others.

"I'd like to get an MD with another degree for research," she said, adding that she like to pursue a career that focuses on women's health.

"Maybe fertility, maybe women's oncological health - I'm not sure at this point."

New Yiddish column editor aims to 'broaden' reach

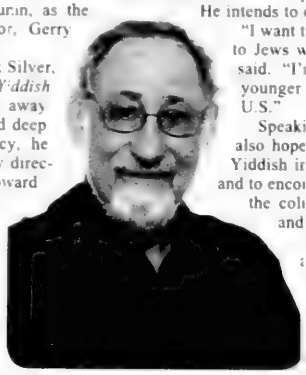
By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

This month, Yiddish readers of The CJN will come to know a revamped Yiddish column, as the paper's new Yiddish Vinkel editor, Gerry Kane, puts his stamp on the page.

Taking over from the late Alek Silver, who ran the paper's bi-weekly Yiddish Vinkel from 2000 until he passed away last April – Kane said while he had deep respect for Silver's editorial legacy, he intends to move the column in new directions and make it one that looks toward the future of the Yiddish language.

Kane, 74, said that while the Jewish community needs to work to ensure the Yiddish "links in the chain of Jewish continuity don't get rusty," he hopes that under his direction, the column will make the community more aware of what it stands to lose by ignoring the language's "treasures."

With regard to charting a new course, Kane said he has two main objectives: the first is to continue to provide something useful to the "traditional" Yiddish Vinkel reader; the second, and perhaps more crucial, goal is to engage younger readers.



Gerry Kane

"I want to broaden the scope of topics touched upon in the subject matter," he said, adding that in its previous incarnation, the column tended to focus on Yiddishkeit in the past, with an emphasis on Europe. He intends to change this.

"I want to touch on subjects more pertinent to Jews who live in North America," Kane said. "I'm in contact with some of our younger academics in Canada and the U.S."

Speaking to that point, Kane said he also hopes to reach day schools that teach Yiddish in communities across the country, and to encourage teachers and students to read the column and write to him with ideas and stories.

"I want the Vinkel to be folkish and reach everyone," he said. "I want it to be something where people have entry to it. I don't want it locked. I want it active, not passive."

Born "into a culture of Yiddish" in Toronto and raised primarily by his Yiddish-speaking mother – his father died while he was still a child – Kane said he learned to appreciate the language by listening to her and her friends speak, and by hearing it spoken as daily parlance in the Jewish community on all matter of subjects, including literary topics.

"I used to listen to the young women working on Spadina Avenue, reading Cyrano de Bergerac and other works... and discussing it together, in Yiddish," he said. "I was in love with the language."

Now retired to take care of his ailing wife, Kane has spent most of his career in advertising, working in the creative departments of the firms McConnell (now defunct) and MacLaren McCann.

He's a graduate of Ryerson University's radio and television program and holds a degree in English literature from Sir George William University (now Concordia University) in Montreal.

For the last five years, he worked as a senior communications consultant to the Ontario government.

Kane has also lectured in Canada and the United States on the subject of Yiddish literature.

He said he's happy to have this new challenge to get Yiddish back out into the secular Jewish community, but he realizes the language might ultimately be preserved by others.

"Yiddish is disappearing," he said. "It is quickly becoming a language of study on the university level. The Orthodox [community] will, I think, in the end, save Yiddish. They look at it in a very utilitarian way. They have their schools, produce books, and now they're even writing poetry and novels. In that sense [the language] is modernizing and reflecting the taste of its users. It is a fusion language."

The new Yiddish Vinkel column begins on Aug. 20.

Is inciting hatred now Church doctrine?

When these words were written, some 400 members of the United Church, Canada's largest Protestant denomination, began a week-long congress in Kelowna, B.C., the 40th General Council of the Church.

The Church's General Council is a triennial gathering during which its members engage in debate and discussion on a wide range of doctrinal, domestic and foreign policy issues. Among the key decisions made at a General Council, for example, is the selection of the Church's moderator, its highest professional leadership position, for the upcoming three-year period.

Some 105 proposals have been officially placed on the agenda for the Kelowna meeting. Among them are four specific proposals that ask the Church to help advance the cause of peace in the Middle East by singling out Israel for opprobrium and disdain in a manner that is chillingly reminiscent of the debates and discussions of the wildest-eyed fanatic anti-Semites.

The substance of the proposals are by now, frankly, quite tired and tiresome. They call on the United Church "to advocate a comprehensive boycott of Israeli academic and cultural institutions," or to "support the international campaign of boycott… divestment and sanctions until Israel meets its obligation to recognize the Palestinian people's inalienable right to self-determination." We have heard it all before: the noisy indignation of the ignorant, the rallying cries of the bigots.

But it is the background material to the proposed discussions that are particularly offensive and alarming. As reported in The CJN last week, one statement in a proposed resolution states that Israel was "built mainly on land ethnically cleansed of its Palestinian owners." Another refers to Israel's war with Hamas in Gaza as a "visible reminder of the ongoing Israeli regime of exclusion, violence and dehumanization directed against Palestinians." Other documents question the loyalty, citizenry and ethics of members of Parliament who are supporters of the Jewish state.

Referring to the language of the anti-Israel resolutions, Bernie Farber, CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), told Canadian Press that "[N]ever in my life would I have thought I would see such accusations coming from one of Canada's mainstream church organizations." Eric Vernon, CJC's director of government relations, told The CJN that the boycott proposals threaten to sever the links between the church and the Canadian Jewish community.

Hurling the accusation of ethnic cleansing is far past the border of reasonable debate and discussion. It is a brazen attempt to demonize Israel. As all knowledgeable, thoughtful individuals know, it serves only to incite hatred against the Jewish state.

Is this now a legitimate United Church of Canada function?

25 years ago in The CJN

Talks continued about forming a unity government after recent Israeli elections, with the chief parties involved being Labor and Likud. However, a temporary deal allowed the 11th Knesset to function, and there was lingering controversy over whether to allow Kach leader Rabbi Meir Kahane to take his seat.

Editorial subverts peace hope

In your editorial "Jews, too, can live in undivided Jerusalem" (July 30), you applaud Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's rejection of U.S. President Barack Obama's reasonable request to cease construction in east Jerusalem, even though it was backed by the Quartet (the European Union, the United States, the United Nations and Russia), if not most of the world. You have evidently not given thought to American policy needs in the Middle East. This is not just about Israel. It is about America's needs for Middle East allies who understand building in east Jerusalem as a repudiation of every peace effort.

You offer as an excuse for that construction the prime minister's spurious claim that Arabs can buy apartments anywhere in the city. That is simply a bold prevarication. Palestinian residents of Jerusalem cannot buy property on state lands, and while they may be able to rent, they do not do so. A small number of Israeli Arabs do, however, live in west Jerusalem, but that is hardly a quid pro quo.

Your cry for "the justice and the right of Jews to live in an undivided and united Jerusalem" rings hollow. It is a right that successive Israeli governments abjured for almost 40 years. Construction in east Jerusalem is intended to thwart a new peace process, as a diversion from Obama's "settlement freeze." Your version of "justice" and Netanyahu's have no place in it for the Palestinians and is, unfortunately, a narrowly nationalistic appeal designed to subvert the hopes for peace.

Jonathan Pollard

Regarding the article "U.S. intelligence opposed to Pollard parole" (June 25), at the same time, that opinion is counterbalanced by other "intelligent" individuals, albeit not professional members of the military corps. Specifically, a number of Torah scholars have recently ruled that the mitzvah of pidyon shvuyim applies to Jonathan Pollard, and that all appropriate diplomatic efforts to secure his release should be pursued. These scholars include Rabbi Joseph Shalom Eliashiv, Rabbi Aryeh Malkiel Kotler, Rabbi Jacob Perlow and Rabbi Aryeh Leib Steinman. They may lack formal training in matters of global security, intelligence or politics, but they are certainly well versed in matters of ethics, morals and divine law. Accordingly, their eminent opinion assuredly merits consideration by the U.S. president, in whose constitutional prerogative lies the ability to free Pollard.

Jewish war veterans

As members of the board of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post, we would like to comment on the article "Volunteer seeks Israelis, Russians for Jewish veterans group" (July 30).

George Stern believes that all Jewish war veterans in Canada should be recognized and organized. Both the Jewish War Veterans, Toronto Post, and the Wingate Branch of the Canadian Legion have been recognized many times by our community and there are no feelings of "being left out" by either of us. Unfortunately, not all Jewish veterans have chosen to join our organization, but our door has been open to them for at least 25 years. And, unfortunately, Israeli veterans in particular have shown no interest to join, and that is something we would like to correct.

For your information, we are proud to have a Russian who is both a Holocaust survivor and a war veteran as a member of our board of directors. Russian war veterans have their own active organization and are on excellent terms with our members.

As for the memorial, as The CJN article stated, our previous executive director did not take into consideration that the original plan to build in Earl Bales Park was much too ambitious for our modest group. With the assistance of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, we will have such a memorial at the Sherman Campus at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Only Canada accepts 'refugees' from Israel

'Provides ammunition for those who claim that Israel is a human rights violator'

By INNA TSINMAN GREBLER

Israel is a democracy with a strong and vibrant free press and an independent judiciary. Still, Canada remains the only country in the world to accept refugee claims from Israel.

Not only does Canada accept refugees from Israel, but research shows the number of those being given that status has increased this decade after a previous decline.

In the past 18 years, nearly 11,000 Israelis have sought refugee status in Canada. The Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada (IRB) has granted refugee status – which will allow the person to apply for Canadian citizenship – to more than 1,600 Israelis or 15 per cent of total claims.

Since the early 2000s, there has been a rise in the number of refugee claims from Israel. In 2007, 17 per cent of these claims were accepted, for a total of 34 claimants. Since the IRB publishes mostly negative decisions from Israel, it is difficult to assess the composition of claimants.

Many explain that the increase in claims in recent years was due to the second intifadah and the Second Lebanon War. The grounds for claims were most frequently objection to military service, followed by racial and religious discrimination and domestic abuse.

From a political standpoint, Canada's acceptance of Israeli refugees comes from a desire to be perceived internationally as a human rights promoter. By accepting refugees from other countries, Canada seeks to elevate itself above other countries.

When he was prime minister, Jean Chrétien appointed several Federal Court judges and IRB panel members. These judges and members, whether out of a sense of obligation or because they actually had ideologies in line with government policies, were more likely to view Israel as a human rights violator, and therefore grant refugee status to those claiming such from Israel.

Community and official Israeli intervention ultimately brought about a decline in acceptance rates, particularly in Quebec. In the early 1990s, Quebec's IRB had a significantly higher acceptance rate than the IRBs in Ontario and Western Canada.

The prevailing thought was that Quebec's IRB members were anti-Israel and used their position to show Israel as a human rights abuser by accepting its refugee claimants.

The Israeli Embassy had suggested that this was due to higher rates of anti-Semitism in Quebec.

In 1994, community leaders, including MP Irwin Cotler and Jonathan Livni, held a conference with Quebec IRB members and NGOs to examine the issue and highlight Israel's judicial systems.

In the following years, the Quebec IRB's acceptance rate for Israelis dropped. During the same period, Ontario's IRB accepted many more Israeli refugees than Quebec did, but this fact slipped by unnoticed by many.

The current refugee system makes it difficult to get a clear picture of why some IRB members accept these claims while others don't.

The IRB is not required to publish the reasons for accepting refugees and only recently began publishing a larger number of positive cases. Previously, the IRB only published those cases that it deemed to be "in the public interest." While the Federal Court offers more transparency, it is not consistent in its rulings.

Although providing grounds of conscientious objection or gender persecution only slightly increases one's odds of acceptance, the outcome of a case seems to be more dependent on the judge's or IRB member's stance on Israel.

The result of Canada's accepting refugee claims from Israel is that it provides ammunition for those who claim that Israel is a human rights violator. While the Jewish community tries to improve Israel's image and Canada's relationship with Israel, each successful refugee claim is a small step backward.

But the IRB's actions don't just make Israel look bad in the public eye. It also creates tension within Canada's Jewish community.

A majority of those claiming refugee status from Israel are Russian, and this causes resentment toward Israeli Russian Jews in Canada because they are seen as working against the Jewish community's causes.

The Israeli Russian Jews who do claim refugee status here rather than going through regular immigration channels sometimes do so out of ignorance of the repercussions. Many are counselled by local immigration consultants to tailor their claims to be more successful. They had encountered legitimate economic difficulty in Israel and wanted to improve their standing by working in Canada, but had exhausted or were unaware of the traditional immigration options.

Like other Israelis who have moved to Canada, most Israeli Russian Jews arrived here legitimately.

Often overlooked is that many non-Russian Israelis make similar claims without garnering community attention or admonishment. A common misconception is that Israelis who claim refugee status in Canada are Russian Jews. This has led to some Russian Jews from Israel in Canada being seen as "double dippers" who take advantage of the rights awarded to them.

But while Russian-Israelis make up the largest group, Israelis from many backgrounds – sabras, Romanians, Ethiopians, Arabs and Turks, among others – also seek status in Canada.

The early 1990s saw the largest wave of Israeli refugee claimants in Canada, with numbers peaking at 1,981 in 1993. Although the IRB does not tally the ethnicity of claimants, a majority of these claims were made following the massive aliyah from the Soviet Union.

In the turmoil of the mass exodus of Russian Jewry to Israel, many who met the criteria of the Law of Return (one Jewish grandparent) but who were not halachic Jews arrived in Israel. Within several years, claims to the IRB from Russian Israelis began to queue.

Professors Robert Barsky and Irving Abella, two prominent scholars on the topic of Russian migration, claim that many non-Jewish Russians used false documentation to leave Russia for Israel in hopes of having better economic conditions and stability.

However, upon arrival in Israel, they were quick to be uncovered as non-Jews and felt resentment from co-workers, neighbours and officials. While this may have been the catalyst for immigration to Canada from Israel, some of those who claimed refugee status used "conscientious objection" to military duty as the basis of their claim. In published claims, all those who made this type of claim in the early 1990s were non-Jews.

The only positive ruling published by IRB during this period is from a Palestinian man who was making claims of persecution against both the Palestinian Authority and Israel.

The mid-1990s to early 2000s saw a drop in the number of refugee claims from Israel, with the highest number of claims at 1,260 in 1996, dropping to 253 in 2000.

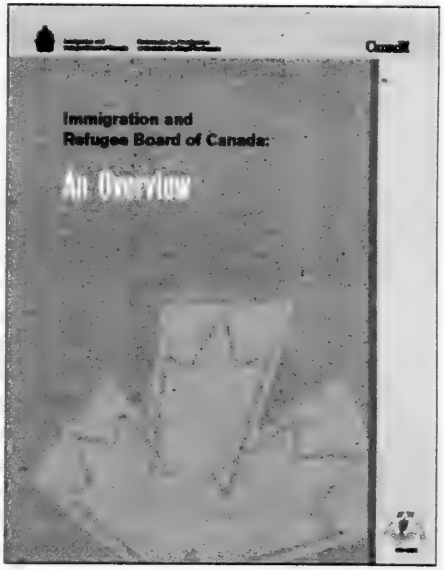
The percentage of accepted claims also dropped significantly, ranging between two per cent and 22 per cent. Again, Russians made up the majority of Israeli claimants; however, a larger number of these were Jewish.

During this time, claims of persecution were being made by Russian Jews who were harassed by native Israelis, had difficulty finding work or were being abused by their husbands. Those who returned to their native countries, such as the Ukraine and Moldova, and then sought refugee status in Canada found their claims being assessed as if they had made the claim from Israel.

A pivotal case in the late 1990s was that of the Kadenko family. Typical of other Israeli-Russian refugee claims, the Kadenkos cited discrimination against them in Israel because they were not fully Jewish, and initially had their claim accepted.

The Canadian government appealed the decision and won, based on Israel having the judicial apparatus in place to address these situations.

This case made similar claims of religious discrimination by claimants from Israel less likely to succeed.



Although the IRB is more likely to provide refugee status to Israelis who claim persecution because they refused military service, this justification isn't sure-fire grounds for acceptance, either.

Idolatry in disguise

Religion brings out the worst in us when we're fanatic and the best when we're pragmatic. The worst manifests itself as idolatry: turning that which is partial and temporary – the work of human minds and hands – into something total, eternal, divine. That's how ostensibly passionate defenders of the faith become idol-worshippers in the guise of piety. Recent haredi riots in Jerusalem are an apt illustration.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

In their important book, Idolatry, Israeli philosophers Moshe Halbertal and Avishai Margalit assert that "the prohibition against idolatry entails not only a ban on the worship of other gods but also a ban on certain ways of representing the right God." Idolatry can also be in our hearts and minds. That's why so many seemingly decent people, including Jews, admire and support religious fanatics.

The late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel defined an idol as "any god who is mine but not yours, any god concerned with me but not with you." For him, "to act in the spirit of religion is to unite what lies apart, to remember that humanity as a whole is God's beloved child." Fanatics despise those who don't share their passions.

The Jewish religious ideal of shalom comes from the Hebrew word meaning "to make whole." Idolatry separates and puts asunder, while true faith unites and makes whole. Idolatry always makes for conflict, true faith makes for peace. Hence the belligerent intolerance of fanatics, be they black-hats or skinheads.

The enemy of truth isn't only falsehood but also certainty. Those who dogmatically assert what God really wants cannot work with those who know that truth is complex. Instead of co-operation, fanatics seek domination. They're prisoners of their certainties. They can only impose, never co-operate.

Fanatics need leaders, real or imaginary. It's easier to be certain when others tell you what to be certain about. By ascribing superhuman qualities to mortals whom they "must" obey – be they rabbis or gurus – they shield themselves from their own responsibility of trying to do what's right.

Normative Judaism is text-based, not leader-based. The Torah of Moses may be perfect, but Moses isn't. Those who invent and glorify saintly authorities distort Judaism.

Purveyors of certainty describe pragmatic religious liberalism as wishy-washy. Bystanders who want to be commanded, not taught, believe them. For me, to be a liberal is a badge of honour bestowed on those who seek to pursue God's truth wherever it can be found, free from dogma and prejudice. The most effective way in which I know how to combat fanatics is to remain true to my liberal convictions and act on them.

Will we be people of the Kindle? Sort of...

Permit me to juxtapose two learning and creating realities.

I have a clear memory of walking down a Montreal street in the mid-1970s with a friend who worked in the computer lab at Concordia University. I had absolutely no idea what he did there, nor any notion of what a computer was. He explained that his computer was rather large and housed in a climate-controlled room. He then asked me if I owned a pocket calculator. I did, and he imagined for me putting that item together with his computer and creating a tiny desktop version of the behemoth he worked with daily. It was all beyond me, but to this day I regret not immediately buying some IBM stock (and, of course, selling it before the millennium).

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

Who knew?

I also remember first learning to use a computer in the late '80s in the Paris office of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. No e-mail, no Internet, just a primitive calendar, an address book and word processing. Clumsy, but promising.

And then there are books and libraries. I just spent five weeks in the library of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York researching a book. It brought back very vivid memories of libraries, great and small, around the world.

One of my earliest library experiences was at the Jewish Public Library in Toronto, getting patient homework help from Mrs. Benjamin, of blessed memory. It was in the JTS library during my undergraduate years and in Butler Library next door at Columbia University where I learned the autonomy of research, discovery and articulate expression that only a mega-library can offer.

The Jewish studies reading room of the National Library at Hebrew University is where I learned the democracy of research. I was a lowly undergraduate in 1965 using the same room and the same books as my teachers, some of the finest minds in Judaica research of that period. It was perfectly acceptable to approach them for help. It was just like Google!

These past five weeks, my mornings were filled with adventure as I searched for new bits of information to complete a pattern of thought that has been with me for several decades. At times, I was frustrated and even frightened by the shelves of books on my particular topic. Too many pages, too little time. Other times, I was amazed that everything I searched for, I found – in this great collection of Judaica. And on brief walks through the stacks, I discovered, with total serendipity, so many new "friends" and a few old "buddies."

Lately, books and libraries have been threatened by the notion that computers will replace them. It's tempting to think that paper and forests will be saved by the electronic storage of data. Virtual space is cheaper than library square footage. No book contains its own search engine. And yet, book lovers still like to walk the stacks and be surprised. We prefer the warmth and weight of an old volume over the cool touch of a Kindle.

It's true that I'm writing this very column on my laptop and that I just checked the spelling of Kindle on Google. At the JTS library these past five weeks, all of my book searches were on a computer, not in the wooden card catalogues of old. And so, we learn to blend these two domains of learning by continuing to enjoy the well-worn volumes of previous generations while taking advantage of the latest technology to enhance our learning ability.

In an earlier column, I noted that when printing became a European reality in the late 15th century, Jews were among the first to both see its great advantage in the transmission of knowledge (one of our most powerful mitzvot) and yet to insist that our sacred reading continue from a handwritten scroll on those days when we read our literary heritage to the public.

We can learn much from that 15th-century decision, which endures to this day, by neither rejecting the latest technology nor deeming it exclusive of our everlasting love of books and scrolls – the very thing that made us Am ha'Sefer, the People of the Book.

A presidential endorsement of the humanities

As a prelude to the convening of the World Congress of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, I was honoured with an invitation from Israeli President Shimon Peres to join a dozen other professors in meeting with him to discuss the current state of Jewish studies.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The congress is a five-day academic conference that convenes once every four years at the Mount Scopus campus of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. This year, more than 1,400 and graduate students in all fields of Jewish studies from around the world gathered to share the fruits of their latest research. The congress encompasses an astonishing range of topics, from antiquities to post-modernism, from rabbinics to film studies.

The conference program – resembling a thick paperback book – concretely illustrates the range, scope, and abundance of work in Jewish studies today. Presented with the program book, Peres began a dialogue with the scholars invited to his home about the shape of contemporary Jewish studies and the challenges that the field faces.

The 86-year-old president is an articulate, cultured and keenly intelligent man, deeply concerned with questions of education in its broadest sense. In particular, he embraces the importance of Jewish studies at the university level as an important source of ethics, values and culture, and as a means to maintain vital connections with deep historical roots and philosophical traditions.

For this reason, he was interested in discussing what many foresee as a crisis in Jewish studies and, more broadly, in the humanities. Especially in face of an unsettled economy, many students have begun to seek out degrees more focused on career goals than the general humanities curriculum. Even students with a natural inclination towards literature, history, art and other less vocationally oriented subjects find that their parents and other life advisers steer them away from these areas in favour of fields whose direct application in future employment is more clearly apparent.

This phenomenon is especially acute in Israel, where many students begin their higher education studies after several years of army service, some already married and with families to support. In addition, in Israel, unlike North America, university students are plunged directly into their major area of study, to the exclusion of other subjects. As a rule, they don't encounter the range of more general and diverse courses required by the North American university curriculum. Moreover, professional training for areas such as law and medicine – which, in North America, follows the earning of a broadly based undergraduate degree – is pursued in Israel at the undergraduate level, with little free time for electives in other subjects. In addition, a growing number of michlalot, or colleges, in Israel, offer focused vocational training in a wide range of fields, such as education, business management, and branches of engineering. A pragmatic society, Israel provides an increasing number of ways for young people to catapult directly into certification for employment, without the "digression" of courses in the humanities.

While acknowledging the economic considerations that impel this system, Peres sees the current diminution of humanities education as a profound loss, one with serious consequences to Israeli society and to Israelis. "The humanities teach someone how to think, how to ask questions," he noted.

A serious reader and writer himself, the president is committed to working with scholars in the humanities and with educational institutions to broaden the reach of the humanities in Israeli education. One possibility might be to incorporate the beginnings of a broadly based higher education into army service itself. "We can send soldiers to the university," he said, "and we can send professors to the bases."

That kind of broad reach is important to the health of culture and society, and vital on the individual level. The exposure to the humanities can reveal untapped talent, he added. "You can never know who will turn out to be talented, a future luminary."

Here, too, in Canada, the temptation, during an unstable economy may be to dismiss the humanities as an irrelevant, unaffordable luxury. But the great humanistic questions, posed across subjects, compel us to struggle with questions we can't easily answer and whose consideration not only enriches our lives, but also is at the heart of the democratic society that we value.

Leipzig's Jewish community rises from the ashes

Kuf Kaufmann could not have put it better. "The existence of a Jewish community in Leipzig represents a victory over Hitler," he said, sitting at at a table at the Auerbachs Keller, a restaurant immortalized by Germany's greatest man of letters, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, in his play, Faust.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Kaufmann, who was born and bred in the former Soviet Union and immigrated to eastern Germany 20 years ago, should know.

When he arrived in Leipzig, the biggest city in the federal state of Saxony, it was virtually bereft of Jews.

Some 13,000 Jews lived here in the mid-1920s, contributing mightily to Leipzig's economy and cultural life. But by 1990, the year in which Germany was unified after more than four decades of division, the Jewish population of Leipzig had dwindled to about 35 mostly elderly people, some of them half-Jewish, who were largely disconnected from all things Jewish, said Kaufmann, who has headed the community since 2001.

The historic Jewish presence in Leipzig, whose current population is around 500,000, was shattered by Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime. The Nazis not only drove out and murdered Leipzig's Jewish inhabitants, they destroyed all but one of its 17 synagogues.

But with the arrival of Russian Jews like Kaufmann, a new, more hopeful chapter in Leipzig's checkered Jewish history was launched. The community has grown modestly but steadily, and today there are about 1,300 registered Jews in Leipzig.

According to Kaufmann – a 62-year-old cartoonist and comedian originally from St. Petersburg – Leipzig had 500 Jews in 1995 and 1,000 in 2000.

Practically all of them are Soviet Jews.

Since then, growth has slowed, due to Leipzig's fairly high unemployment rate, which stands at 15 per cent, and to Germany's decision to tighten immigration regulations.

In actual fact, there are roughly 4,000 Jews here, half of whom have no official ties with the community, said Kaufmann, who emigrated from the Soviet Union after his daughter was assaulted in an anti-Semitic attack.

When he was asked how many of the unaffiliated Jews are halachically Jewish, he grew testy, pounding his hand on the table. "We're all Jewish," said Kaufmann, an otherwise cheerful person.

He acknowledged that the dismal economic situation has prompted younger Jews to leave Leipzig for supposedly greener pastures in Germany. His own family has been affected by this development: Kaufmann's 38-year-old son lives and works in Germany's capital, Berlin.

Nonetheless, he is bullish, saying that the community is continuing to build a solid infrastructure for the future.

This past May, a cultural centre, known as Ariowitsch House, was opened in a ceremony attended by Jewish community members and city dignitaries. Ariowitsch House was a Jewish seniors home in the early 1930s. By 1942, all its residents had been deported. (The last transport of Jews bound for Theresienstadt left Leipzig in Feb. 14, 1945, three months before Nazi Germany's surrender). During the post-war Communist period, the building was used as a municipal seniors home.

Kuf Kaufmann

Apart from its cultural centre, the community is served by a Torah centre, a kindergarten and a synagogue, the Brody or Broder shul, the only one in the city to survive Kristallnacht in November 1938.

Services are conducted by an itinerant rabbi who also attends to the religious needs of Jews in Dresden and Chemnitz (formerly Karl Marx Stadt) and by Rabbi Dovid Chandalov, a young Belarus-born rabbi who heads the Torah centre and serves as the representative of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation in Saxony.

On a recent evening, Rabbi Chandalov – a 29-year-old graduate of Ner Israel Yeshiva in Baltimore – led services at the Brody shul, which was consecrated in 1904 and is in the Mitte district, near the zoological garden and the massive railway station.

The 15 congregants were Russian, and all but four were over the age of 30. By the rabbi's estimate, most Russian Jewish immigrants here are over 40 and dependent on welfare payments. They are, however, glad to be in Germany. "People just want to leave Russia," he said. "It's a difficult place. They don't care where in Germany they end up."

Rabbi Dovid Chandalov

The compact synagogue has a blue linoleum floor and is decorated with stained glass windows. The roof is supported by white columns embossed with gold leaf and blue and maroon flourishes. The high ceiling is adorned with blue squares and gold Stars of David. A curtain separates men from women.

Surprisingly, not a single police officer was on duty outside guarding the synagogue, which is indistinguishable from adjacent buildings. Synagogues everywhere else in Germany are protected day and night. But on the door leading directly into the shul, the phone numbers of the police and fire departments were posted, just in case.

Before the rise of Nazism, the Mitte was filled with Orthodox shuls, from the Eitz Chaim Synagogue on 8 Otto Shillstrasse and the Beth Yehudah Synagogue on 11 Faberstrasse to the Chevra Mishnayoth Synagogue on 24 Humboldtsrasse and the Boyaner Synagogue on 24 Leibnitzstrasse. For years, the rabbi of the Brody shul, at 4 Keilstrasse, was Ephraim Carlebach (1879-1936).

The majority of Jews in the Mitte were Polish Jews, and in a prelude to Kristallnacht, they were deported to Poland.

On Kristallnacht, the Brody Synagogue was spared, due to its proximity to Christian-owned buildings. But all the other shuls in the neighbourhood, as well as the Grand Synagogue – a mid-19th century Reform shul on Gottschedstrasse – were destroyed. On the site today is a memorial stone and 140 empty chairs to signify the Holocaust.

In a sense, Leipzig is a city of Jewish ghosts.

At 1 Goethestrasse, a plaque affixed to the side of a building informs visitors that it once housed the Bamberger and Hertz department store, a concept pioneered by German Jews. The edifice, now occupied by Citibank, was renovated by the owners, Ludwig and Gustav Bamberger, before the Nazis expropriated it. The Bambergers were killed during the Holocaust.

The 10-storey concrete-coloured Kroch building, the first highrise tower in Leipzig, is decorated with a striking fresco of medieval figures. The brainchild of the banker Hans Kroch (1887-1970), the mini skyscraper was finished in 1928, during the Weimar Republic period, and was aryanized in 1939. Kroch left Germany after being imprisoned in the Buchenwald concentration camp.

From 1875 to 1928, Leipzig was a hub of the fur trade, with hundreds of shops located around and along Bruhlstrasse in a series of arcades. Jews were heavily involved in the fur business, but after their departure, Leipzig never regained its prewar eminence in the industry.

Rabbi Chandalov and his wife, an American of Russian descent, live in an old apartment building that the Nazis herded Jews into before they were "resettled" and murdered in Riga, Belzyce, Theresienstadt and Auschwitz. It is two blocks from the Brody Synagogue, and the rabbi can walk there in a few minutes.

From 1939 onward, the 2,000 Jews still remaining in Leipzig were segregated in 47 such buildings. All were marked with a black Star of David.

Seventy years on, Rabbi Chandalov hopes that Leipzig's resurrected Jewish community will thrive and prosper.

His success will be a mighty rebuke to Hitler and his followers.

Lack of peace separates U.S., Israeli Jews: Bronfman

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

What keeps Israel and U.S. Jewry apart is not a lack of religious pluralism, but the lack of peace in the Middle East, according to Charles Bronfman, one of the Jewish people's most prominent philanthropists.

Though he said he was hesitant to "be very political," as he put it, Bronfman recently told Ha'aretz that peace is now crucial to Israel-Diaspora relations, because Israel's image is deteriorating and North American Jews "are not insulated against CNN."

Charles Bronfman

Bronfman, a Canadian-born billionaire and a co-founder of Birthright Israel, said that the program, which brings Diaspora youth on subsidized trips to Israel, is a major uniting force. But he added that the program's alumni are generally put off by North America's Jewish organizations and reluctant to replenish their dwindling ranks.

The concern for Israel's image is both connected to the current tensions between Jerusalem and Washington D.C., Bronfman clarified.

"Whatever tensions there appear to be, they're a blip on the radar," he said. "The two countries need each other. What can't stay is the status quo. It's going to kill everybody here in this whole area."

Former U.S. President Bill Clinton "told us how to get out of the status quo years ago," Bronfman said, alluding to the formation of a Palestinian state. "We all know what the answer is. Getting there is another matter."

In the meantime, Israel is having limited success in telling its side of the story, according to Bronfman, who last month concluded one of many short visits to Israel.

"We turned from David to Goliath in 1982, with the invasion into Lebanon, and the Arabs became David. Now everybody's worried about the Palestinians. Now we're occupiers, oppressors, who live by the sword. That's what you see in the media, and it festers and has effects on the general population and on Jews as well."

He named Birthright as just about the only major force that helps "reduce the widening gap" between U.S. Jewry and Israel. "I've been with Taglit for so long because they get the job done, and because it's a brand. As a businessman, I appreciate brands," he said.

In its nine-odd years of existence, the Birthright (or Taglit) brand has sent some 230,000 young Jews on their first visit to Israel, funded by a consortium of private philanthropists, Diaspora communities, the Israeli government and Jewish organizations such as Keren Hayesod and the Jewish Agency.

Birthright is producing new Jewish leadership in North America, Bronfman said, but they tend to stay away from the federation system – the central framework for North American Jewish institutions and their co-ordination.

"Changing the culture of any institution is very difficult," said Bronfman, who turned 78 last month.

"I've been in business all my life and I've seen that most mergers fail not because of the numbers, but because of the people. If the cultures don't mesh, you get no deal. And there's a big cultural difference between the institutional federations and the enthusiastic alumni just back from Israel."

Last year, Bronfman, the Montreal-born heir to a large family business in the liquor industry, married Bonita Roche after the death of his second wife, Andrea Morrison, who was killed in a car accident in 2006.

The problem between Birthright alumni and Jewish institutions, according to the financier, is that when Birthright participants seek to become active with the federations, "they are usually given a list of names and told to solicit, because that's what the federations focus on – getting money."

Citing recent research on the Taglit phenomenon by Prof. Leonard Saxe of Brandeis University, Bronfman said that half of Jewish campus leadership in North America is made up of Birthright alumni.

"So they don't go into the federations. So what," he asks, sitting in his office in the centre of Jerusalem.

Recalling his own experience as a former federation president and first chairman of UJC, he said: "I feel badly for the federations. They are lost and they've seen their total numbers going down. They have internal problems and they need to save money. They can't carry out revolutions."

But Birthright, with help from the federations, has recently launched a retention program called Birthright Next. It aims to provide a framework of activities for Taglit alumni so as to preserve and harness their new understanding – and often love – of Israel.

"With the advent of Birthright Next, the federations are figuring out how to engage the alumni and that's a very positive step," said Avi Naiman, past chair of the Israel and overseas committee of UJA Federation of Northern New Jersey. "The problem is being recognized and addressed. Results remain to be seen."

Bronfman seemed to stiffen a little in his chair when the conversation touched on the differences between North American Jewish pluralism and the haredi institutional monopoly over Israel's rabbinate.

"This is the only Jewish homeland, yet only Jews of one persuasion can get married here," he said with annoyance. "Some can't get buried in certain places. It's crazy. This was meant to be a haven for all Jews, but one group controls everything."

Noting cases of soldiers who died in defence of Israel but who were refused burial in the same cemeteries as their comrades because they weren't considered halachically Jewish, Bronfman said: "It's a total disgrace. But if there were peace, then maybe something would happen with pluralism as well. Who knows."

Soviet defector's book marks 34 years of freedom

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Vladimir Rott considers every day a miracle since his defection 35 years ago from the Soviet Union to Canada.

Rott, 74, fled the Communist country in 1974 with his mother after determining his family had no future under such a harsh regime, especially as Jews.

The Rott family hid its Jewishness from the Soviets by registering themselves as "ethnic Hungarians" to avoid government reprisals.

Though he was a successful engineer, with as good a salary as one could get under the conditions back then, Rott knew he had to defect to the West or risk losing not only his family, but his identity as well.

Last month, Rott, who now lives in Toronto, published part one of a two-part autobiography, titled In Defiance of Fate. Book 1: Joy From Sadness, detailing the travails of his family under Soviet rule.

Vladimir Rott

A large part of the book is informed by Rott's expansive diary, which he has kept for most of his adult life.

At more than 490 pages, the first volume of Rott's first-person, family narrative, is compelling, taking the reader from town to town – Rott provides rich details of family stops in Garadna and Miskolc, Hungary and Soviet Bobruysk, Tomsk and Togliatti through the early part of the last century – and peppering the pages with archival photos of both family and landmarks.

The book is a richly detailed voyage of Rott's life, guiding the reader from his family's early years in Hungary through to his childhood experiences growing up in German-occupied Bobruysk, in what's now Belarus. It also highlights his years as a student in Tomsk, as an engineer in Siberia, and his respected work supervising the monumental Lada-Vaz Volga automobile plant in Togliatti.

In a recent interview, Rott told The CJN that the book – which he penned in his native Russian and had translated into Hungarian and most recently English – is his loving tribute to his mother, Regina, and father, Ferenc, as a way of both immortalizing and lionizing them.

It's Rott's second time around as an author.

In 2007, Rott published Father's Letters from Siberian Prison, a collection of handwritten letters that his father wrote while imprisoned in a Siberian gulag under Stalin.

Rott was only three when Ferenc was taken. He never saw his father again.

With this new autobiography, Rott said he wanted the book to provide closure for his life without a father and to honour his mother's stern-yet-inspiring role in his life.

"Thirty-four years ago I 'forgot' to go back to Russia," he said. "I had to fight to get my family back. The RCMP believed I was a [Soviet] spy. And the Soviets, in allowing me to go to Canada, expected me to spy for them. But I told [the RCMP], 'I need a future for my children and I [will] need a grave for my mother, because I don't have one for my father.'"

As an act of symbolism, Rott insisted that his Hungarian-based publisher, Széphalom Könyvmuhely, place the images of his parents' gravestones – he commissioned one for his father in Toronto, who he presumes dies in a gulag and whose grave remains unknown – on the front and back covers of In Defiance of Fate, to further cement their memories on a lasting document.

"I became a writer just because I started writing," Rott said. "But I had two huge supports [for this book]: my father's letters and my family. My grandchildren provided the subtitle to this book."

In his interview, as in his book, Rott describes how he befriended a distant cousin who lived in Toronto and was able to take a trip to Canada with his wife, Iya, in 1973, on the condition that he "spy" for the KGB.

This brief visit overseas opened Rott's eyes to the "wonder" of the freedom in the West and cemented his resolve to find a way out of the USSR for the sake of his family.

A year later, Rott conceived of a plan to fool his Soviet minders into believing his family was Protestant in order to ostensibly attend a wedding in Toronto.

After much cajoling and political intrigue – which Rott scrupulously retells in the book – the Soviet authorities finally allowed him to take just one family member with him to the wedding.

As he recalls toward the end of the book, Rott had to navigate a multitude of bureaucratic red tape and mistrustful authority figures to get out of the Soviet Union.

Ultimately, it was two boxes of chocolates that finally allowed him to escape. He used them to bribe Aeroflot employees into issuing special tickets allowing him and Regina to board an Air Canada flight to Toronto – both airlines had a tacit agreement that allowed each other's passengers to use either airline to fly out of Moscow, Rott said – and once in the air with his mother seated beside him, Rott broke down in tears when he heard the flight attendants announce they were out of Soviet airspace.

"We are now flying over Helsinki," Rott writes. "And that is when my nerves failed me and my eyes filled with tears."

But the cost of his and Regina's freedom did not come cheaply. His wife, Iya, and their children, Edwin, Sandor and Ilona, were left behind.

The tale of how they were liberated from the USSR and eventually joined him in Toronto is being left to the second book in Rott's series, which he is currently writing. It's tentatively titled In Defiance of Fate, Book 2: Joy of Discoveries. He anticipates its release sometime next year.

Lodz to mark 65 years since ghetto's destruction

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

LODZ, Poland — This city in the geographic heartland of Poland, once home to a vibrant Jewish community, plans to mark the 65th anniversary of the destruction of the former Nazi ghetto from Aug. 27 to Aug. 29.

There will be a Jewish cultural festival and a conference on Polish-Jewish relations during the Nazi occupation, among other events.

The hosts will be the mayor of Lodz, Jerzy Kropiwnicki, and the president of the city's small Jewish community, Symcha Keller.

Jaroslav Nowak, the mayor's adviser on Jewish affairs and a business consultant who visits Israel frequently, said that the main events marking the liquidation of the ghetto will take place at Survivors' Park, which was opened in August 2004 to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the ghetto's liquidation.

The park, set on 8-1/2 hectares adjacent to a river valley, was a garbage dump that has been transformed into a wooded retreat planted with trees to honour victims of the Holocaust.

At one of the events, Nowak said, a monument designed by Czeslaw Bielecki will be unveiled.

Consisting of a stylized Star of David and a hovering Polish eagle, it pays tribute to the more than 6,000 Poles who helped Jews during the war and have been honoured as Righteous Gentiles by Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem.

According to the mayor, the monument will serve as "a symbol of humanity in the hell of the German occupation, both for Jews and Poles."

The Lodz ghetto was established in the spring of 1940, about seven months after German forces captured the city and renamed it Litzmannstadt. It was the last ghetto to be destroyed by the Nazis.

Stretching over much of the north central part of Lodz and administered by Chaim Rumkowski, the head of the Judenrat, the ghetto was packed with some 166,000 inhabitants, including Roma. The ghetto's population was later augmented by 40,000 deported Jews from nearby Polish towns and villages and from Germany, Austria, Luxembourg and what was then Czechoslovakia.

The ghetto managed to survive until August 1944 because its workshops produced an array of goods for Germany.

The last remaining Jews, including Rumkowski and his family, were deported to Auschwitz.

Before then, however, thousands of Jews in the ghetto were sent to German death camps throughout Poland, while a large number of Jews succumbed to starvation and disease.

Of the more than 200,000 Jews who lived in the ghetto, only about 10,000 survived.

Forty thousand Jews who had found refuge in the Soviet Union settled in Lodz after the war, but due to a pogrom in Kielce in 1946, the majority left Poland. Today, there are officially 300 Jews in Lodz.

Meanwhile, in connection with the 65th anniversary of the destruction of the ghetto, an exhibition on Chassidism in Poland has begun.

The venue, the City of Lodz History Museum, was formerly the palace of Izrael Poznansky (1833-1900), one of Poland's wealthiest Jews in the 19th century. Running until Oct. 20, the exhibition mainly consists of photographs.

The curator, Anna Walaszczyk, writes in the official catalogue: "We prepared this exhibition to enable visitors to get acquainted with this colourful world... We are portraying a world which no longer exists, but was so much present in Poland until 1939."

In another development, construction of a Centre of Dialogue is scheduled to start in September. Designed to promote co-operation between Jews and Poles, it is set to be finished in 2010, Nowak said.

Costs will be borne by the municipality and Mordechai Zisser, an Israeli businessman originally from Lodz who has commercial interests in the city.

Exciting things are happening in the Negev

By SUSAN STEINBERG

Guest Voice

I recently returned from Israel's beautiful southern region of Eilat/Eilot, Toronto's twinned community in Israel, where I spent time offering my perspective and learning about the many creative programs designed to integrate new olim, and especially more professionals, in the magnificent Arava.

Susan Steinberg

I was blown away by the innovative, integrated, professional and all-encompassing approach in training and absorbing new olim. Through strategic partnerships, the people of Eilat have turned what was once an isolated community into a thriving area, fuelled by a zeal for building a strong and caring community.

I spent a day volunteering and learning about the path that olim from around the world take upon arriving in Eilat. How inspiring it was to see the effective, competent way in which Eilatis embrace these immigrants.

Israelis actually go to the various countries of origin to interview people coming to Israel. Among other opportunities, they offer prospective olim the possibility of enrolling in a unique work-study program in which the government pays 75 per cent and the student 25 per cent. Many olim/students work as cooks, pastry chefs, receptionists, travel agents and tour guides. They usually pay their own living expenses, but often hotels provide accommodation and food.

A carefully designed program for Hungarian olim, called 3*3, aims to fill middle management jobs in hotels. A six-month ulpan language program includes two months of learning English.

The multi-layered program attempts to ensure that each individual integrates into Israeli society while trying to take into account personal, family and cultural needs, expectations and differences.

In Be'er Sheva, I toured the kitchens at Ben Gurion University, where cooks and pastry chefs learn their trade and then find work in the region in various venues of the tourism industry. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has invested heavily in such educational programs in the region.

While in southern Israel, I also had the opportunity to visit several very different kibbutzim in the Eilot area, just north of Eilat. They, too, play a significant role in helping to integrate the new olim.

We started at Yotvata, which offers a program for new olim called Bayit Rishon Bemoledet – First Home in the Motherland – which is also supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. It's a six-month combination ulpan and work program. The kibbutz, with its own distinct community family, becomes the olim's first home in their newly adopted homeland.

Lotan creates its feeling of community around the tenets and values of Reform Judaism, where great emphasis is placed on Jewish identity and equality.

Yahel, I was surprised to learn, is now 60 per cent privatized and is on its way to becoming entirely privatized. There I met a man from France who runs a lucrative printing business. In the middle of co-operative kibbutz life is this creative capitalistic entrepreneur running a thriving business!

In Grofit, I met a seasoned kibbutznik who explained that the emphasis of this kibbutz is community cohesion and not standard of living. "How many of us crave this bent yet stay stuck in pursuit of the high standard of living?" I wondered silently.

Our final stop was Ketura, a kibbutz founded by Young Judea idealists from North America. Here, the traditional, secular and egalitarian meld with a strong belief in social justice and equality. Though co-operative in income-sharing, the kibbutz also attracts outside investors for its innovative environmental and other projects.

When asked what makes the kibbutz unique, the answer was "our sense of purpose, not just a better material existence." By sense of purpose, members stressed that they meant a lifestyle that includes "meaning, community, pluralism, interesting work, a great lifestyle and making a contribution to Israel."

Our community in Toronto has much to be proud of in its role in helping to build this stunningly beautiful region of Israel. It is a true partnership driven by people – here and in Israel – who believe that anything is possible.

Susan Steinberg is a volunteer with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and immediate past chair of the Aliyah Committee of Toronto.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Cult of the saint

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The culture, customs and prevailing ways of a particular society in which a Jewish community exists will in some ways influence the customs of its Jews, either by them emulating the ways of the general society – Chanukah gelt is a case in point – or by wholly rejecting certain aspects of it. This thought might make us quite uncomfortable, but it's a fact.

An example would be the veneration of the tzaddik – the saint which, with the exception of chassidic circles, simply doesn't exist in the Ashkenazi experience. For Sephardim, on the other hand, venerating a saint during the saint's life and beyond is an integral part of being Sephardi.

The reason for this difference is simple and geographic. Ashkenazi Jewry developed in lands dominated by the Catholic Church. Catholicism and the veneration of saints are inextricable. Ashkenazi Jews, therefore, identified themselves as a community apart by distancing themselves from this practice as much as possible. Sephardim – Jews from Muslim lands – had no need to do this in establishing their self-identity.

Saints – many, many of them – are very much a part of everyday Sephardi life. Their names are invoked in everyday speech. Candles are lit in their memory, especially so at times of distress and, of course, when their yahrzeits, which Sephardim refer to as hiloula, are marked. Lavish celebrations take place.

Becoming a member of this rarefied society of saints is no simple matter. It involves piety and scholarship. It involves refinement of character, and it involves absolute inner goodness. But mostly it requires verifiable events of supernatural intervention.

Around the middle of the 19th century, Rabbi Yaakov Halevi of Mogador was travelling in a large caravan numbering in the hundreds through the deserts of Morocco, a 15-day trek accomplished mostly in the coolness of night through one of the harshest and certainly most barren places on earth. Beyond the dangers of the elements and the lack of resources was the compounded threat of barbaric highwaymen and wild animals.

On the eve of Shabbat, the caravan was astounded as a stubborn Rabbi Halevi refused to continue and instead began to prepare to honour the holy day. Sadly, the caravan abandoned the rabbi to his certain fate. Undeterred, he went about his preparations, setting out his bread, lighting his candles and praying the twilight service.

At the precise moment when the sun set over the horizon, a huge lion paced toward his camp and sat down. The rabbi and the lion silently locked eyes throughout the night, and the following day, on Shabbat, the lion sat silently and followed the rabbi's movements with his eyes.

As the sun set in the distant desert horizon, the lion crouched down next to the rabbi and signalled for him to mount him. Rabbi Halevi sat astride the lion, and in no time, he was borne to the entrance of the town for which he was bound.

The townspeople were clearly surprised, since the rabbi appeared on a Saturday evening many days before the expected arrival date of his caravan. Because of this incident, Rabbi Halevi added Ben Shabbat to his family name.

The fruit of God's difficult work

The midrash relates a beautiful narrative that, in recent months, has taken on a new perspective in my life.

A Roman matron asked Rabbi Jose bar'Halafta: "How long did it take God to create the world?"

He said to her, "Six days."

"From then until now, what has God been doing?"

"God is occupied in making marriages."

"And is that God's occupation?" the woman asked. "Even I can do that. I have many male slaves and many female slaves, and in one short hour, I can marry them all off."

"Though it may appear easy in your eyes," he said, "every marriages is as difficult for God as the dividing of the Sea of Reeds."

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

At times over the course of my engagement, it has seemed like making a marriage is, in fact, a task as difficult as splitting the Sea of Reeds. As decisions about venues and menus, bands and boutonnières, seemed to overshadow the romance of wedding planning I jokingly asked my fiancé, "Why don't we just elope?"

Each time, two things drove me back to planning.

First, I realized that weddings aren't only about the marriage of two individuals. They're also about the union of two families and two communities. Over the last few months, I feel blessed to have seen our parents, sisters and extended families come together in celebration. Over l'chaims and brunches, planning meetings, pre-Shabbat phone calls and even flying trapeze lessons, our engagement has served as the fertilizer for flourishing new relationships between our families.

As friends and family gather for our wedding, I realize how fortunate we are that our extended communities will sing and dance together at our chupah. The rabbis tell us that it's the community's responsibility to entertain the bride and groom at their wedding, and these experiences – being danced from the chupah by friends and hoisted on chairs by relatives – would have been missed in the simplicity of Vegas or Fiji.

Second, I realized that wedding planning is not about the colour of napkins (I still don't know what colour they'll be, nor will I likely remember this detail the day after the wedding), but rather it's about planning a celebration that's personal and meaningful.

In planning our wedding, we have striven to be creative in infusing pieces of ourselves into a traditional ceremony. We will publicly sign a halachic prenuptial agreement, signifying our solidarity with the plight of agunot. We will celebrate the signing of a civil marriage license alongside the ketubah, indicating our commitment to both Halachah and civil society. And I will take ownership of the ketubah by receiving a wedding band from my fiancé. These innovations, while still within our understanding of Halachah, are our way of making the wedding our own. To me, these personal touches were the highlight of our planning.

The midrash continues: What did the matron do? She took 1,000 male slaves and 1,000 female slaves, placed them in two rows and said, "This one should wed that one, and this one should wed that one." In one night, she married them all.

The next day they came before her – one with a wounded head, one with a bruised eye, and one with a broken foot.

"What's the matter with you?" she asked.

Each one said, "I don't want the one you gave me."

Immediately the woman sent for Rabbi Jose bar Halafta and said: "Rabbi, your Torah is true, beautiful and praiseworthy."

"Indeed a suitable match may seem easy to make, yet God considers it as difficult a task as dividing the Sea of Reeds," Rabbi Jose acknowledged.

I feel blessed to have been the recipient of God's difficult work and eagerly look forward to Arielle and I spending the rest of our lives reaping the benefits of God's labour.

Jewish Life

Not your average animal house

Thanks to movies such as Animal House, the American Pie franchise and countless other mind-numbing frat movies, fraternities across Canada are looked upon with judgmental eyes.

People assume anyone remotely associated with a fraternity is a mindless beer guzzler with nothing but last Saturday's party on their mind. But this is not the case for members of the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi, which has chapters all over Canada and is the largest fraternity at many Canadian universities.

ON CAMPUS
By Justin Dahan

AEPi, as it is more commonly referred to, tries to focus on more than just the typical shenanigans. It also puts heavy emphasis on Jewish programming and philanthropic events.

Members of AEPi often hold positions in both the fraternity and other Jewish organizations. In Ottawa, every Jewish organization has members who are also in the fraternity. Last year, Chabad president Adam Berktin was also a member of AEPi, and current president Jonathan Brownstein shares the same distinction. These two men share an ideology that helps to strengthen Jewish ties between students and spread Jewish philosophy on campus, by doing such things as setting up tables on campus and combating anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist feelings whenever they arise.

The Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) at Carleton University also has assistance from a rising star in the Jewish community. Daniel Tsyganovskiy came to Carleton University as a 17-year-old Russian exchange student. It took him little time to become a member of AEPi and vice-president of the IAC. Now he's an active member of Ottawa's Jewish community.

When you sit down with Tsyganovskiy, he makes his opinion about the Jewish community very obvious. He begins by explaining the importance of what he is doing and what he feels needs to be done.

"It is very important to be a member of the Jewish community. Through the history of mankind, Jews have been a great example to this world. We are a people that always maintain a community in every possible situation," he says. "By being a 'brick' in this 'wall' that I like to call the Jewish community and building the 'wall,' we create a single strong piece, which cannot be influenced in any way or by any other force. So by being in this 'wall' or community, we make our nation stronger and greater."

Hillel in Ottawa may not have an AEPi member in a senior position, but it has many active members from AEPi, men such as Asher Farber, Zev Kershman and Mark Klibanov, who have played an active role in the national campus organization. These guys attend most of Hillel's events and relay information to other members of AEPi, helping to make sure that all Jewish students are aware of Jewish programming on campus.

The importance of these men playing a role in the Jewish community, in and out of AEPi, is more than just about the positions they hold and the planning and organizing that they do. It's proof of Tsyganovskiy's words that Jews — observant or not, and affiliated with various groups – form a community. We band together and continue to strive to unite the Jewish people.

Israel and cyberwar, Part 2

The Jewish Highway

There's a war going on between Israel and its neighbours. At least we think there is. Sometimes it can be hard to know for sure, because this war is taking place in secret. In my last column, I looked at using the web as a propaganda tool in the Mideast conflict. But there is a more dangerous side to cyberwar.

Computers can be used to hack into enemy databases and cause serious loss of data or even plant harmful software to commandeer strategic computers.

Because this combat is clandestine, it can be next to impossible to verify claims, at least on the record. And because this is also a psychological battle, each side may be seeding rumours in order to intimidate the enemy. You will also notice that there are more analysts willing to speak on and off the record about Israeli cyber strategy than about comparable Arab or Iranian tactics.

In October 2000, during the second intifadah, Wired.com reported that pro-Palestinian hackers defaced at least 40 Israeli sites, including the Bank of Israel and Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, while Israeli antagonists marred 15 Palestinian sites. Analyst James Adams warned the attacks between Palestinians and Israelis are "just a taste of things to come… Their weapon of choice, the laptop, is easily available, and the ammunition, viruses and hacking programs, is free on the Internet." [tinyurl.com/webwar13]

"This has become a very important area in Israeli strategy, and it has to be taken into account," Israeli defence specialist Alon Ben-David told ABC News in July. "It has become a more and more important element both for intelligence gathering but also for aggressive operations." There have been several Israeli successes according to Ben-David. "The Iranians have experienced a number of malfunctions and unexplained breakdowns, all of which point to foreign interference in the supply chain for the program." [tinyurl.com/webwar14]

Breaking into an adversary's website to display propaganda or pornography can be irritating. But websites can house much more sensitive information that requires constant protection. The BBC's Ahmad Budeiri reported from Jerusalem that "private companies are involved in this war to provide protection for [Israeli] government and financial websites which are constantly under attack and sometimes breached." Saji Maysar, marketing manager of the Internet security business, Samial, told Budeiri that if there was ever a successful attack on his company, it would be the equivalent of a strike on a key military base. [tinyurl.com/webwar15]

"To judge by my interaction with Israeli experts in various international forums, Israel can definitely be assumed to have advanced cyber-attack capabilities," said Scott Borg, director of the U.S. Cyber Consequences Unit, which advises various Washington agencies on cyber security. Borg told Reuters that malicious software ("malware") could be inserted to corrupt or crash the controls of sensitive sites such as uranium enrichment plants. Attacks could be immediate or could be set to strike automatically when an infected facility reaches a more critical level of activity. [tinyurl.com/webwar17]

The article continues with an intriguing statement – although no proof is provided. "Tony Skinner of Jane's Defence Weekly claims that Israel's 2007 bombing of an alleged atomic reactor in Syria was preceded by a cyber attack which neutralized ground radars and anti-aircraft batteries."

China's Xinhua news agency notes that Israel is not alone in cyberwarfare. "Experts say Iran, Syria, Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon and many more are also developing techniques that use modern technologies to infiltrate the enemy. 'Everybody in the region is doing it,' said Mike Dahan, a political science expert in the communications department of Sapir College in Israel's Negev." [tinyurl.com/webwar16]

I'll leave the last word to the BBC's Ahmad Budeiri. "Many analysts now believe that the Israeli capability in this cyberwar may now be as strong as more traditional Israeli defences built up over the past half-century. It is difficult to judge who is winning this war, or sometimes to even find out where the battles are being fought. But Israel's considerable intelligence resources need to be constantly on full alert to prevent a successful attack by nimble enemies who are becoming increasingly astute in fighting a virtual war from their laptops."

Teens urge cellphone firms to support Congolese

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish teens who live by their cellphones are being mobilized to call on the phone manufacturers to ensure that revenues from the sale of a key microchip component called coltan go where they belong: to the people of the war-ravaged Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC).

About 80 per cent of the metallic ore coltan is mined in the DRC for world export.

The lobbying effort is an initiative of the Human Promise, an advocacy group founded by Montreal Jewish teens to help the people of another war-torn African region, Darfur, in Sudan.

Co-president Shawn Greenstone, who works at the Human Promise office located at the Quebec Jewish Congress, said in an interview that his members launched an online petition and letter-writing campaign at the end of last month, to get cellphone manufacturers to make sure profits from coltan sales don't go toward financing one of the deadliest rebel wars in Africa.

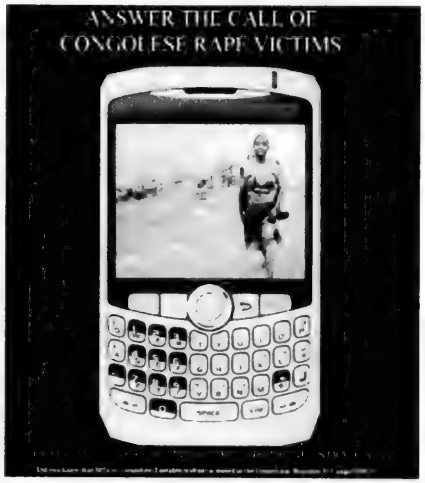
A colourful poster being used as part of the campaign depicts a large cellphone. On the screen is an image of a grief-stricken Congolese woman.

The message at the top reads: "Answer the call of Congolese rape victims."

They are sending the information to teens across Canada.

"We don't want to boycott cellphones. That's not the point," Greenstone said. "The issue is not the sale of coltan or making profits. It's where the money is going."

"Kids are really getting behind this," said Adam Eliesen, Human Promise's other co-president. "It's an extremely important cause."



Poster for the Human Promise's cellphone campaign

An article by Liberal MP Irwin Cotler that appeared this year in Global Currents says "six million people have died in the Congo since 1996 – half of them children five years or younger – in this most ignored of tragedies."

A Human Promise letter being sent out by an estimated 1,000 Jewish teens to Canadian cellphone manufacturers states that the high demand for coltan "has made people very greedy, and that greed has taken a very negative toll on the people of [the DRC].

"You are undoubtedly aware," the letter says, "that the DRC has the vastest quantity of coltan available, which is great for their economy."

However, "revenues from the mining of these resources appear to be financing the continued war, as well as tearing apart what should be a flourishing economy."

The revenues, the letter continues, "are contributing to the displacement [and] murder of far too many Congolese over the past five years.

"As Canadian teens concerned by human rights, we believe that every Canadian corporation that directly benefits from the natural wealth of Third World countries has the moral responsibility to ensure that the people are the major beneficiaries of money brought in through Canadian sources."

A Human Promise press release issued July 29 cited a recent report by London-based Global Witness – an international NGO that researches links between natural resources exploitation and human rights abuses – saying the cellphone industry "is directly contributing to the coffers of those who are committing unmentionable atrocities against the Congolese."

As "major consumers of cellphones," Greenstone said in the same press release, "we are bringing the plight of the Congolese, and the role of the cellphone market, to the attention of our peers around the world."

Greenstone told The CJN the letter-writing campaign and petition are only a "starting point" for continued action.

Cotler, whom Greenstone said is supporting the group's petition, wrote in his 2009 article that "the people of this country have endured years of killing fields, war, poverty, disease and displacement…

"Now, the vulnerable in the Congo are not only suffering, yet again, mass displacement, widespread starvation and murder, but also what one African correspondent has called 'without doubt the most horrific and persistent abuse of women in the world' – an 'epidemic of rape' that includes sexual enslavement, public gang rape and brutalized assault."

Pride parade to include 'anti-apartheid' marchers

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Plans by gay and lesbian activists to bring at least 100 people to Montreal's Aug. 16 Pride Parade to protest Israel's "racist apartheid" policies is striking Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) leadership as ironic – and prompting it to respond.

QJC president Adam Atlas noted that Israel is one of the world's most gay-friendly countries and that Congress is working with local gay organizers to ensure that Israel "is celebrated as well" at the march.

"We would have thought the goal was to be inclusive, not exclusive," Atlas said of plans to allow the "anti-apartheid" marchers.

"The idea is not to exclude people in the same way they were once excluded."

The plans to muster support among pro-Israel march participants will serve to "at least in part, celebrate [Israel's] virtues," Atlas said.

In a show of solidarity, on Aug. 3, Congress representatives joined non-Jewish members of Montreal's gay and lesbian community at a park in the city's gay village to express joint outrage over a homophobic shooting rampage two days earlier at a Tel Aviv nightclub in which two gay teens died.

At the vigil, Rabbi Shachar Orenstein of the Spanish & Portuguese Synagogue represented Congress, and its human rights committee chair, Abby Shawn, noted the Jewish and gay communities' common historic legacy of "hatred, victimization and persecution."

At the same vigil, Montreal gay rights activist Michael Hendricks commended Israel for actively pursuing whoever is responsible for the rampage. March participants were reportedly also urged at the vigil to wear black to remember the gay Israeli victims. It was also suggested that the march be dedicated to the victims.

According to a news item in the July 30 issue of the Montreal Mirror, headlined "Queers come out against apartheid," "anti-apartheid" protesters hope to mimic the success of a similar protest held at Toronto's gay Pride Parade in June that was organized by Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QAIA).

"A huge queer contingent in Toronto was successful ... this past June," the item said. "[T]he Montreal contingent will be made up of at least 100 people at the parade."

It appears to be the first time that the annual parade in Montreal will contain overtly political content. In addition, one day before the parade, on Saturday, Aug. 15, a second annual "queer book fair" will include a "Queering Activism Against Apartheid Workshop" that will "give participants an introduction to Israel's occupation of Palestine," the Mirror reported.

Jordan Kerbel, the Toronto-based director of public affairs and communication for Canadian Jewish Congress, argued that QAIA didn't control the message at Toronto's Pride parade as much as the group might have liked.

He said more than 100 people marched alongside members of a Toronto Jewish gay and lesbian group, Kulanu, to demonstrate Israel's open attitude toward gays and lesbians and as a gesture of solidarity. Among them was Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

"It's just disappointing," Atlas said of the Montreal plans. "We support free expression, but in a way that is inclusive.

"There is a marked similarity between Montreal and Tel Aviv in terms of the acceptance of the lesbian and gay communities," he said. "Which is what makes it so ironic that gay and lesbians should be protesting against Israel."

U of T aims to draw 'very smart' Jewish studies majors

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Last year, the community encouraged University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies director Hindy Najman to "build more, build higher, and dream in Technicolour," she said.

Since then, many of her goals have already begun to take shape.

The centre has a brand-new master's program; it now offers new courses in medieval studies; it is accepting funds from the community to build on what it currently offers and the centre has been moved to a more central location on campus.

"A crucial message that we want to give is that we are a community resource with a global reputation. We promote Jewish literacy while we address matters of interest of the Jewish community – interests in cultivating Hebrew language and literature, addressing interests to support Israel, and to support initiatives like the student exchange program with Hebrew University [of Jerusalem]," said Najman, who is an associate professor of ancient Judaism at U of T.

Over the past year, a new program in Jewish philosophy and thought has been established at the centre. The program is being supported in part by the Jerahmiel S. and Carole S. Grafstein Chair.

"There is a Grafstein post-doctoral fellowship for Israeli scholars, where we bring in for a full year a scholar who just completed his or her PhD from Israel," Najman added.

"We have a Torontonian, Sol Goldberg, and he just got a PhD last month from the Hebrew University in the department of philosophy and he was also one of [Jewish philosopher Emil] Fackenheim's last students."

On Sept. 10, the inaugural lecture for the Grafstein Chair in Jewish Philosophy, "Encounters Between Modernity and Jewish Philosophy," will be given by Prof. Paul Franks. The lecture, which is open to the public, will be held at the George Ignatieff Theatre in U of T's Trinity College.

In addition to the Grafstein Chair, Najman said the centre received funding from private donors to help build on Yiddish literature and language studies.

Najman also boasted about a new Jewish studies master's program that she hopes will build on the strengths of the existing PhD program.

"It is designed to both attract very smart North American Jewish studies majors at the undergraduate level and also strengthen our PhDs," she said.

The PhD and master's programs are interdisciplinary, which means [they offer] courses in archeology, art, history, languages, literature, performance, philosophy, political science, religion and sociology. This year, there are also new courses in medieval studies.

Najman added that over the last year, the PhD program has tripled in size to accommodate more than 30 students.

But she hasn't lost sight of the 2,000 undergraduates who take Jewish studies courses.

"Together with my faculty, I have reworked the undergraduate program," she said. "We now have four areas of concentration and our majors and minors are soaring."

The four areas of concentration are in classical Judaism (studying classical texts including the Hebrew Bible, the Dead Sea Scrolls, Hellenistic texts, and rabbinic literature), Jewish thought and philosophy, Jewish history and social science, and Jewish culture and literature.

Najman said she is thrilled by the support that she and the Centre for Jewish Studies receives from the U of T to help raise its profile.

The dean of faculty of the arts and sciences, Meric Gertler, moved the Centre for Jewish Studies to U of T's Sydney Smith Hall.

"It's the heart of the campus. It's the place where the dean's office is, where the human resources is, and perhaps most important for all the undergraduates... It's the place of the office of the registrar," Najman said.

"We have traffic all the time. Even in the summer, when it's supposed to be dead time, we've got people coming in and out the entire summer, and we're thrilled. We don't want down time. We want it full all the time, and we have a beautiful space to receive students."

The centre also has a hand in a conference stemming from the Royal Ontario Museum's exhibition of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which will be on display until Jan. 3.

Hindy Najman

Najman and her colleagues have organized an academic conference called "The Dead Sea Scrolls: Transmission of Traditions and Production of Texts," set for Nov. 15 to 18 at U of T.

"I've invited [University of] Waterloo, York [University] and McMaster [University] to be part of an upcoming conference... I've invited these universities to help support what will be the most major scrolls conference in Canada ever, with scholars from Israel, Europe, the United States and Canada, all coming together to talk about how the Dead Sea Scrolls celebrate the transmission of traditions of ancient Judaism and beyond," Najman said.

"I think the thing that I'm most excited about... is we are bringing [Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto students] to the ROM and the ROM is opening its doors to hundreds of students."

Najman said that she has many more programs and conferences planned for the near future, including an Israel studies conference, which will be held in Toronto and co-sponsored by the centre.

The 26th annual Association for Israel Studies conference is scheduled to take place next May to explore the topic of Israel and the World.

Endocrinologist completes medical 'Triple Crown'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At almost 75 years old, Dr. Paul Walfish, a physician at Mount Sinai Hospital, still has more than 20 years to go before he reaches his father's age at retirement.

His father Henry, now 103, practised law until he was 97, said Walfish. "He taught me that if you like what you're doing, you stick around, and if you have your health, age doesn't matter. He is my shining example."

Dr. Paul Walfish

As a professor emeritus of medicine, pediatrics, otolaryngology, pathology and laboratory medicine at the University of Toronto, and a senior consultant in the Joseph and Mildred Sonshine Family Centre for Head and Neck Disease at Mount Sinai, Walfish, an endocrinologist, said he's doing more than ever and has no plans to retire.

"The word is not in my vocabulary," said Walfish, who along with his wife has two children and two grandchildren.

A member of the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario, he was recently honoured with the 2009 John B. Stanbury Pathophysiology Award, making him the first Canadian to win three prestigious awards from the American Thyroid Association.

In 2004, he was awarded the association's Paul Starr Award, and in 2007 he was awarded the H. Ingbar Distinguished Leadership Award.

All three awards honour outstanding contributions in the field, said Walfish, "and to win [them all] is exciting. It's like winning the Triple Crown in horse racing."

He said that peer recognition in itself is a great honour, but to make it an even more special honour, John Stanbury was Walfish's mentor when he spent a year at Massachusetts General Hospital and Harvard Medical School after completing his speciality training in internal medicine at the University of Toronto in 1963.

"I still have the letter inviting me to come and study there. [This award] is an unexpected spinoff of my career, since I worked with [Stanbury.]"

Since he joined Mount Sinai in 1964, Walfish has become well known for his pioneering work involving screening newborns for the detection of an underactive thyroid condition using a heel-prick test. As well, along with his colleagues, he pioneered the application of ultrasound and fine-needle biopsy in North America to systematically investigate thyroid nodules in the early detection and treatment of thyroid cancer.

By the early 1970s, he had gained international recognition for important breakthroughs in the detection and treatment of thyroid disorders.

In addition to his research, however, he has maintained a strong conviction to stay in contact with patients, and he spends half his working time – he plays tennis during his leisure time – with them. "I still learn from my patients. I have discovered a few syndromes while treating them."

Becoming a physician was a natural thing for him, he said. "I always had a passion for science and biology. Anything and everything always interested me."

Arts Council mentors Koffler through funding controversy

"The Koffler Centre of the Arts no longer has anything to do with Reena Katz or the exhibition."

However, Katz and Simon, in a statement that they e-mailed to friends and colleagues last week, wrote that they have been in legal negotiations with the Koffler since late May and have reached a confidential agreement.

They also wrote that the TAC determined that Koffler "was in violation of the City of Toronto's non-discrimination policy regarding an individual's right to freedom of political association."

Katz and Simon's statement expressed their "understanding that while the TAC will not be withholding funding from the Koffler, they have approached this situation in a productive gesture of stewardship. This includes working non-punitively with Koffler around issues of anti-discrimination policy development, transparency of mandate, curatorial and board structure, as well as accountability and eligibility where public funds are concerned."

Hopkinson said she "was "not going to refute" the statement, but added that it's TAC policy "to work with clients in good times as well as bad times, and to provide a mentorship role."

Katz and Simon notified friends and colleagues in their statement that they consider the upcoming presentation of the project – for which details were expected to be available this week – "a positive outcome of a very difficult situation."

They also said the Koffler "sent a defamatory press release across the country, falsely claiming that Katz supports the extinction of the State of Israel."

Katz told The CJN that Koffler officials "claim that I support the extinction of the Jewish state. I say I'm an anti-Zionist."

Her e-mail statement with Simon added that the pair "encourage continued personal and public dialogue around Israel/Palestine and the role of cultural institutions in relation to discussion and dissent. The events of these last few months have embodied the extreme need for such dialogue in all our intersecting communities."

Community groups lobby United Church

Other groups made similar arguments to the church in the days prior to the start of the council.

Among the numerous press releases on the subject issued last week, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Canada, the Jewish Defence League and the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem Canada [ICEJ-Canada] all denounced the proposals.

"It is difficult to begin to catalogue the moral evils of some of the resolutions and the attached 'supporting material.' They are better suited to propagandists of Hitler's Germany in the '30's than the largest Protestant church group in Canada," the Simon Wiesenthal Center said.

Meanwhile, ICEJ-Canada – which describes itself as a "movement of Christians worldwide who share a love and concern for Israel" – said both the spirit and wording of the resolutions "come perilously close to resurrecting the medieval blood libel against the Jews."

It added that "the United Church of Canada will have aligned itself with the wretched campaign that began at Durban in 2001 to isolate Israel from the family of nations and delegitimize it out of existence" if it passes the resolutions.

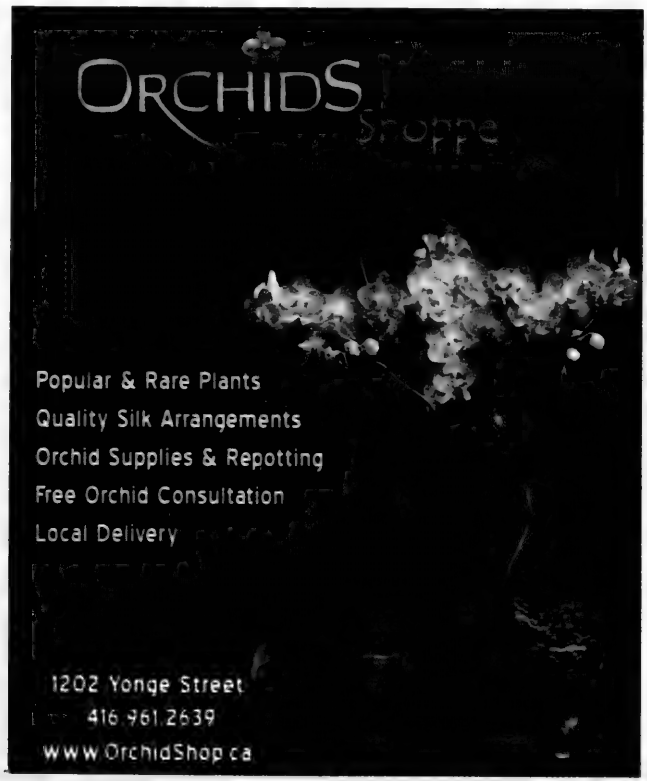
For its part, the Jewish Defence League of Canada staged a protest last Thursday afternoon in front of the church's national office in Toronto.

Speaking to the National Post, Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, said he was "disgusted" by the proposed resolutions and called them "an obscene gesture by a religious group."

On its website, the church maintains that it continues to support Israel's "right to exist in peace and security," while simultaneously promoting conditions it believes will promote a "just peace" between Israelis and Palestinians.

According to the church, those requirements include recognition by Israel of a "fully sovereign State of Palestine with secure borders, and territorial contiguity encompassing the West Bank and the Gaza Strip"; "the dismantling of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip"; "the ending of suicide bombings as well as other forms of violent attacks directed toward civilians on the part of Palestinians," and "the withdrawal of Israeli military forces to pre-1967 borders and the ending of all forms of collective punishment and violence by the Israeli government on the Palestinian people."

Should the church's boycott and divestment resolutions pass, Congress has said relations between the Jewish community and the United Church of Canada will "definitely be strained."



Easier ways to preserve summer fruit

BY DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

Welcome to the "peach pit." No, not the iconic diner of TV's Beverly Hills 90210, but my kitchen – so named at this time of year for the hundreds of cooked peaches destined for the freezer.

Peaches are the last in, synonymous with the countdown to summer's finale. Since I have already put up a bonanza of fruit for next winter, the peaches (sans pits) are squeezed into the last parking spots between the blueberries, cherries, strawberries and rhubarb.

My way of preserving fresh fruit does not involve cans or jars: too much of a production, and with my luck, I'd risk botulism. But the bliss of having so many wonderful farmers markets in and around Montreal and elsewhere – Atwater and Jean Talon are my go-to sources—makes it almost a sin not to stash away some of summer's bounty. Indeed, one of our first purchases on returning to Montreal was one of those small freezers that purrs away happily in a corner of the basement.

Let's begin with the easy: blueberries.

Dump a pint box of blues in a bowl, discard any mushy or mouldy ones and place the rest in a good-quality freezer bag. Wash under warm water by the handful only when ready to use. To eat: zap gently in the microwave for 30 seconds to a minute in a little water in a microwave-safe bowl, longer if necessary but make sure the fruit doesn't get hot. Warmed this way, the berries stay juicy and are great alone, with bananas or paired with a melon like honeydew or cantaloupe.

For baking: don't defrost, but blot well with a paper towel after washing. Toss with a smidgen of flour to sop up excess moisture. Frozen berries burst with flavour during baking.

Strawberries: Fresh strawberries are a joy ride. Best time to buy is at the strawberry festival in late June. We grab an early morning parking spot near the market, then head over to our favourite vendor to snap up at least two flats (12 pints to a flat) of these succulent red jewels.

To conserve: hull berries, slicing off a thin piece from the top where the stem was. Again, discard any with mould (soft berries are OK). Place whole berries by the pintful in a colander (buy one of those cute small ones for easy handling), and wash very well under warm, then cool running water. Drain and dump in a big bowl. When you've got several pints ready this way, start slicing the berries (or leave whole if time-pressed), sprinkle on a little sugar if necessary and spoon into one-quart freezer bags. Press out any air and zip up, leaving at least an inch or two of room at the top for expansion in the freezer.

To enjoy: run a bag of frozen strawberries under warm water for a minute, then place the closed bag in a deep, roomy bowl to defrost in the fridge. (Or while still partially frozen, empty berries into a bowl and zap gently in the microwave.)

Peaches: All right, I admit this is labour-intensive and you need to set aside a good couple of hours. But with a little music and the prospect of free samples to taste, it's time well spent (away from the phone).

It took a few years of trying, but I've managed to streamline a cooking process for peaches that not only cuts my time by half but yields a better texture and taste.

Here's how: choose firm, ripe or almost-ripe peaches. (Don't use greenish or hard ones.) Fill two big bowls with very cold water and place on the counter nearest the stove. Have a large empty bowl nearby.

Fill a 4-quart stainless steel or Corningware pot three-quarters full with water and bring to a boil. Turn heat down to medium and carefully drop in peaches one by one, close together but without overcrowding. (This isn't gefilte fish – all the peaches will bob to the surface and that's as many you want cooking in one shot.) Cook, uncovered, a few minutes (if a fork can pierce the peach, it's done, but I prefer the cooked fruit to retain some firmness. Trial and error will be your guide.) Remove the peaches one at a time (I use a fork) and immediately plunge into one of the cold water bowls. Wait till they cool a bit, and then dunk them again in the second cold-water bowl.

Drain and place peaches in the reserved empty bowl. Refill your cold water bowls and repeat the process. While each batch cooks, slip off the skins from the drained peaches (or as much skin as will easily let go). When cool enough to handle, slice or chop peaches (discarding the pits) and spoon into one-quart freezer bags, adding a tablespoon or two of brown sugar per bag.

If you're starting to feel like Lucy and Ethel trying to keep up with all those chocolates coming down the conveyor belt, don't. Leave the skinning and slicing until all the peaches have been cooked and are cool enough to handle. Just have several bowls ready to hold the waiting fruit.

Again, leave some room at the top of each bag for the peaches and juice to expand in the freezer.

Make sure you change the cooking water after a couple of batches, and when reusing the water after the first batch, add some fresh water if the level is lower than what you started with.

Keep in mind, too, that sliced peaches throw off a lot of juice; I keep most of this excess liquid to use now in fruit drinks or fruit soup.

When you're hankering for some sunshine next winter, defrost the peaches in their sealed bag that's been placed in a roomy bowl (to catch any leaks) in the fridge. Or, when slightly defrosted, dump the contents into a microwave-safe bowl and zap till tepid but not hot. Enjoy at breakfast or with vanilla yogurt for dessert. Extra nice with some of those blueberries.

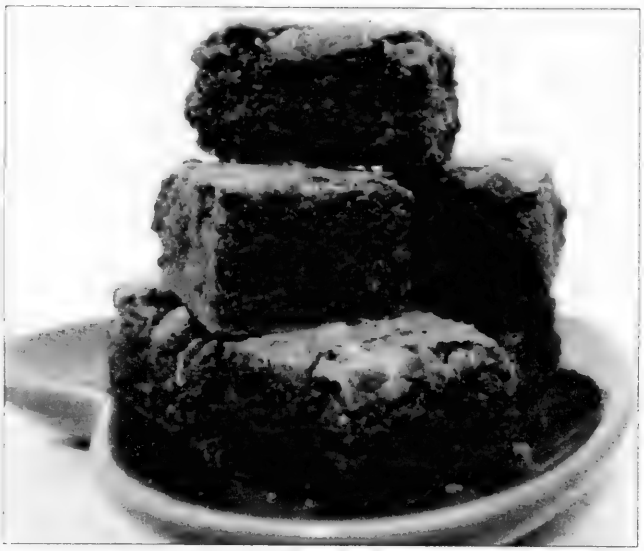
Brownies — a dessert for all occasions



By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In her book The Brownie Lover's Bible (Whitecap 2008, Revised), Lisa Slater states, "Brownies are what I call the little black dress of the baking trade: as perfect in a pan at the school fundraising sale as they are all dolled up on a plate and served after an elegant meal."

If you're a brownie lover, this is definitely the book for you. Not only are the recipes great, but the book is a whole education in brownie-making.

According to Slater, you can store brownie batter in the fridge or freezer. Brownie batter is almost indestructible and has a long shelf life, thanks to the high proportion of sugar and fat, both preservatives. Just put the batter in a lidded container and cover the surface of the batter with some plastic wrap as a double form of protection from air and moisture. There's usually no need to adjust your baking times or temperatures.

Although brownies are an American phenomenon, they have been adopted by bakers all over the world. They're simple to make and prepared for sheer enjoyment. There are basically two types of brownies – fudge brownies and cakelike brownies.

Fudge brownies contain large amounts of sugar and butter or margarine. The relatively small quantity of flour is what distinguishes this bar cookie from others, and what gives brownies their characteristic moist texture and taste. The number of eggs in a recipe has a bearing on the texture of the finished product. A one- or two-egg formula will produce a rich, dense brownie. With more eggs, the brownies are lighter, more cake-like. Cake-like brownies usually contain leavening as well; fudge brownies don't.

Once all the ingredients are ready, the way you mix your brownies will affect their texture. For dense fudge brownies, you only have to stir the batter with a fork until it's well blended. Cake-like varieties are usually beaten more vigorously.

There are a number of ways to vary basic brownies. The easiest is to add a different flavouring: 2 teaspoons instant coffee powder or 1-1/2 teaspoons cinnamon, for example. Or you can mix in texture ingredients: about 1/2 cup chopped nuts, chocolate or white chocolate chips, chopped toffee, tiny marshmallows or raisins.

When baking brownies, timing is important. Check them after the minimum time suggested in a recipe. If you bake them too long, they will be too dry; if you don't bake them long enough, they'll be soggy. Insert a toothpick into several spots; if it comes out clean, the brownies are done.

Cool the brownies slightly and eat. Or break them into pieces and fold them into a homemade vanilla ice cream base just as the mixture is beginning to freeze. Or use them underneath ice cream, sauce and whipped cream to create a sundae.

BUTTER-AND OIL-FREE OMEGA3 BROWNIES

From The Brownie Lover's Bible

With a bit of whole wheat flour, no butter or oil and some ground flaxseeds for an Omega-3 boost, I would call these "guiltless brownies." Just don't overbake them.

1/4 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup brewed coffee
3 1/2 oz. bittersweet chocolate
3 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
3 tbsp. ground flaxseeds
1/4 cup whole wheat flour

Preheat the oven to 300. Line an 8-in square pan with overhanging parchment paper and grease the exposed sides with vegetable spray.

Place the sugars and coffee in a deep saucepan. Over medium heat, stir to dissolve the sugar and bring the mixture to a boil. Remove from the heat and add the chocolates. Whisk until smooth. Add the eggs, one at a time, whisking until smooth. Add the vanilla and salt. Whisk in the ground flaxseeds and whole wheat flour.

Pour into the prepared pan and tilt or spread to make even. Bake in the oven for about 20 minutes. The top will puff and be shiny. Remove from the oven and cool the brownies in the pan. Chill them further in the fridge so that they are easier to cut. Flip the brownies onto a cutting board, and cut into squares. They will be fudgy and delicious. Makes 16.

CHOCOLATE CRUNCH BROWNIES

1 cup butter or margarine; softened
2 cups sugar
4 eggs
6 tbsp. baking cocoa
1 cup flour
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1 2 tsp. salt
7 oz. marshmallow creme
1 cup creamy peanut butter
12 oz. semi-sweet chocolate chips (2 cups)
3 cups crisp rice cereal

Preheat oven to 350. In a mixing bowl, cream butter or margarine and sugar; add eggs. Stir in cocoa, flour, vanilla and salt. Spread into a greased 13x9x2-in. baking pan. Bake at 350 for 25 minutes or until brownies test done. Cool. Spread marshmallow creme over cooled brownies.

In a small saucepan, melt peanut butter and chocolate chips over low heat, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; stir in the cereal. Spread over marshmallow layer.

Chill before cutting. Store in the refrigerator. Makes 16.

If it won't last, then get out, fast!

Question: Julie, who has been unemployed for a long time, moved in with me two years ago along with her two young children, aged five and seven (no kids of our own). Their dad pays child support on time, but no spousal support.

The house is solely in my name. Julie pays nothing towards the mortgage or utilities, but she is good with her hands and has helped with certain home renovations, gardening, housecleaning, snow shovelling, etc. I have tenants in the basement, so she also takes care of their issues, collects and banks their rent monthly. She helps pay for groceries and household expenses.

We're not married and have not really discussed it. If we did split, what legal liabilities might I have now or in the future? What can I do to protect myself?

Answer: Get out, fast. Unless, of course, you are convinced that she is the love of your life and that this is a permanent relationship. Just remember, 39 per cent of marriages lead to separation in Canada, but the rate is 70 per cent for those who just live together.

1. You are not married. So, she has no "automatic" property claims. However, she could claim that her indirect contributions to the upkeep of the home and its maintenance without compensation have "unjustly enriched" you. Under the law of constructive trust, she might become the beneficiary of an equitable proprietary interest in the home of which you might become her trustee for some 20 to 50 per cent of the home's equity. Only a Judge, based on the facts of each case, can determine the precise amount, or it can be negotiated by agreement.

Solution: Ask her to sign a cohabitation agreement drafted by a competent family law lawyer and reviewed by independent lawyer.

2. If and when you separate, you will likely be liable for child support for her children under the Child Support Guidelines, even though they are not your kids biologically and even though their father is already paying. And no, there is no cohabitation agreement or other agreement that can help you, even if signed before Julie moved in. So speaketh the Supreme Court of Canada and other courts.

3. Since you have not lived together for three years or more, or alternatively you have not had a child together after living together for one year, then you have no liability for spousal support, even if she grew dependent since you were married.

Solution: Once again, have her sign a cohabitation agreement limiting her rights of spousal support.

Writer's lifelong ambition becomes a reality

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Fran Edelstein's first book, Set to Music and other Stories, is a dream come true for the 70-something writer whose passion for writing began when she was 15.

"In school, I loved composition and couldn't wait for that English period," said Edelstein, who was born in Montreal and moved to Toronto at the age of four. "I always wanted to write the great American novel. The first one that really hit me was Gone with the Wind."

After graduating from Harbord Collegiate during the Depression, Edelstein opted for a government job, since she understood the difficulty of making a living as a writer. "I couldn't follow that route, but I always wanted to go back to writing, and I did many many years later," she said.

Fran Edelstein

Edelstein's book of seven short stories includes Set to Music, a compelling story about a concert pianist with an obstacle to overcome; Lilacs, a poignant love story of two children separated by the Holocaust and drawn together as adults; and Deedu, about a special relationship between a young Canadian girl and a Russian immigrant.

Edelstein wrote many stories over the years and tucked them away. "When I retired seven years ago, I picked up some and thought, 'I'm going to polish them up.' I changed some a little bit and had a lot of fun doing it," she said.

"I would start stories and never finish them because I was raising a family. My three children were all under six and my husband travelled, so I didn't get much time, but when an inspiration came to me I would put it down – Lord knows where it would end up."

Many of her ideas were scribbled on scrap paper, which her children would find later under sofa cushions.

At 42, Edelstein upgraded her writing skills at Ryerson and subsequently met novelist Margaret Laurence at a dinner party.

"I went over to her and struck up a conversation. I told her my mind just races with all kind of ideas, and I can't seem to keep to one before another one comes running in at me and didn't know what to do. She said [I should] create a futures file, and 'every time you get an idea, you should just tuck it in there and keep writing.' She was a great inspiration."

But it wasn't until Edelstein began selling antique silver that she combined her passion for writing with her love of art and antiques, freelancing for publications including Ontario Showcase and Canadian Coin and Stamp.

She wrote the story Lilacs after profiling artist Marcello Febbo.

"When I went to Marcello's art show, I loved his painting, Alone, of the back of a man wearing a hat standing on a mountain. There was something about it that grabbed me. I stood and looked at it for the longest time – I was very sad to see him alone. When I went home, I started writing Lilacs, and didn't realize for years that I called

התערוכה תישאר בטורונטו עוד המישה חדשים וממש כדאי לכם להיזהר ממנה, אפילו אם תקבלו כרטיסים בחינם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

"Every Little Step"

זהו סיפור נהדר על הרצון האנושי, על היכולת להתמודד עם קשיים, לעל עצירים מוכשרים להפליא שמוכנים להקריב הכל כדי להיכלל בשורת המקהלה. והכל שזור בסיפורו המקורי של המחזה המיוחד הזה עם יוצרו האגדי מייקל בנט שנפטר מאיידס בשנת 1987 בטרם שהיו תרופות למחלה הקטלנית הזו.

Today, Edelstein's inspiration comes from her husband and from the Editor's Choice award she received for her first book. She's currently writing an extension of her title story Set to Music and doesn't plan on stopping until reaching her next goal – writing the great Canadian novel!

Student playwright's Facebook Musical explores romantic, social mishaps on campus

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Look up, Toronto! Jonathan Blankenstein's star is rising.

Blankenstein, 20, is the creator of The Facebook Musical, an original Broadway-style production that could be the hottest ticket in town this summer.

The musical, presented by Steppin' Out Theatrical Productions and the Dramantics Company, will have a five-day run at the Berkeley Street Theatre Upstairs from Aug. 18 to 22.

Blankenstein, an unassuming straight-A science student going into his third year at the University of Western Ontario, juggles schoolwork and musical theatre.

"Science offers me academic fulfilment, but music and theatre is my life."

The Facebook Musical follows the romantic and social mishaps of five first-year university students navigating the pitfalls of campus life.

The show explores their angst, their relationships and the complications of socializing in cyberspace, says Blankenstein.

"It's about people reaching out through social networking and in real life."

He describes the transition from high school to university as a time of emotional vulnerability, because people's lives are in flux.

"When you finish high school, you think that's who you are, but things are so dynamic at university. Your whole life is changing... I wrote the play to capture those years," he says.

Through social networking sites such as Facebook users can hide their vulnerability, he adds.

"People are creating images of themselves that they want people to buy into. There's a difference between the real person and the screen persona. The Facebook Musical is a reflection of these conflicting emotions – the ever-present struggle between your public face and the face you see in the mirror."

Blankenstein, who began studying acting at the Children's Theatre Project in Richmond Hill, Ont., when he was in Grade 7, says he is able to infuse humour into the show because cyber networking lends itself to many funny situations.

"You don't really realize how expansive the social network is until you're thrust on such a big scene like Facebook... Everything you do ends up on Facebook," he says, adding that although he doesn't have a profile, information about him surfaces on his friends' profiles.

Blankenstein wrote The Facebook Musical after first-year university. It premièred in London, Ont., in January at a fundraiser for Feed the Children, organized by UWO students.

The musical was workshopped two months later in Toronto at the Paprika Festival, a theatre and arts festival for youths under 21. Some of the songs were performed at Toronto's Fringe Festival last month.

Blankenstein says he's been buoyed by the positive feedback from the two earlier productions, noting that the show has been revamped for its upcoming Toronto run.

He is collaborating with Brian Lee, 18, a first-year film student at York University and the artistic director of Steppin' Out Theatrical Productions. The two met through their involvement in a school play at the Richmond Hill Campus of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

After reading the script, Lee, an accomplished theatrical director and musician in his own right, told The CJN he quickly offered to direct and co-produce the musical.

"I said, 'This has to be performed.' It's an unbelievable show. It's a truly modern piece of musical theatre... It's superb musical theatre."

Lee also lauded the talent of the six-member ensemble cast, made up of Paul Shulman, 18; Tess Barao, 22; Katie Reid, 17; Emilio Vieira, 17; Jaimie Meltz, 19, and Beckie Saslove, 22.

"It's amazing to hear them bring the music to life."

Saslove, a dance and drama teacher who recently graduated from UWO with a joint major in French and medical science, was an original cast member and a co-director of the London run of The Facebook Musical. She's reprising her role as Olivia this summer.

"It's great to have someone give me directions," she said of Lee. "I get to focus on playing my role."

Blankenstein is also pleased to have Lee at the helm. "Now all I have to worry about is the musical direction."

The Richmond Hill resident says he was determined to do musical theatre, but because he has no innate singing or dancing ability, he turned to composing.

"I realized that if I ever wanted to be part of this magic, I'd be best off writing it."

Although he has little formal musical training, Blankenstein was writing original songs by the age of 15. In Grade 11, he became involved with CHAT's production of Alice in Wonderland.

"I convinced the director to let me turn it into a musical. The more songs I wrote, the more the cast wanted," he says.

"Doing Alice in Wonderland was one of the best nights of my life. I was a nerd in elementary school. I was picked on. But after that musical, there I was standing on the stage and everyone was cheering. It was amazing."

That year, the Paprika Festival produced his first short play, a musical called Carnaval, and invited him to be writer-in-residence the following year.

"They let you write whatever you want."

Carnaval is about politics and the "hypocrisy of romance" in a small French town. "Professionals performed it," he recalls.

"Some of them had even performed on Broadway. 'Wow,' I thought. 'I may actually be able to do this.'"

To purchase tickets for The Facebook Musical, call 416-368-3110. For more information, visit www.thefacebookmusical.com.

Fatah reserves 'right' of 'armed struggle'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

BETHLEHEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas will continue to lead his Fatah party.

Abbas, who was named to succeed the late Yasser Arafat as head of the party in 2004, was elected Saturday in an unopposed race to serve as party chief. The election came during the Fatah congress in Bethlehem, the first such conference in 20 years.

Fatah endorsed the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel, underlining its ideological conflict with the Islamist Hamas and drawing political battle lines for their next election showdown. The meeting tried to finesse the key principle of violent resistance against Israel, calling it a right but preferring measures like civil disobedience.

The decisions at the congress were similar to those at the last convention in 1989. The gathering in Bethlehem, which was supposed to end last Thursday after three days, was prolonged repeatedly by old splits over the key issues.

Lurking in the background was the challenge facing Fatah from the rival militant Hamas group, the issue of the elections tentatively set for January, and the internal Fatah splits between young and old, moderates and militants.

The convention voted to endorse a platform that calls for a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, while reserving the movement's right to take up arms against Israel. At the same time, it encouraged Palestinians to use more peaceful means to pressure Israel, such as demonstrations and supporting a boycott of Israel abroad.

"At this stage, we are focusing on popular struggle, but the armed struggle is a right reserved to us in international law," said senior Fatah member Nabil Shaath.

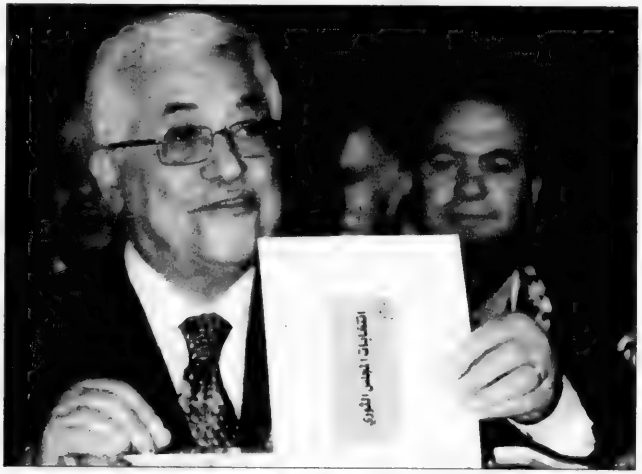
Defence Minister Ehud Barak described the adopted Fatah platform as not very promising. But he added that there was no other way but to sit down and strike a deal, calling on Abbas to enter negotiations.

Elections for the party's main governing bodies, the 18-member Central Committee and the 120-member Revolutionary Council began on Sunday.

Hundreds gathered outside a hall in the Bethlehem convention centre were handed empty voting sheets, and a list of some 700 candidates for 80 available seats on the revolutionary council and another 100 for the 18-member central committee. It took Abbas almost 20 minutes to fill out the lengthy ballot.

Abdullah Faranji, a senior Fatah member, said the voting would end the fights over the group's leader's legitimacy.

The strongest competition is taking place between Fatah's hardline old guard – many in their 80s – and a generation of younger Palestinians who have emerged from the West Bank and Gaza Strip and back Abbas' more moderate approach.



Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas votes for his own election in Bethlehem. |Flash 90|

One of the strongest contenders is the charismatic Fatah leader, Marwan Barghouti, 50, who is serving multiple life sentences in an Israeli prison for his role in terrorist attacks in Israel.

But Fatah founders like Salim Zanoun, 87, who lives in Jordan, are also vying for spots.

Abbas was hoping for members who will support his program, based on negotiating a peace treaty with Israel.

The results of the voting had not been announced by the time The CJN went to press.

Earlier in the week, Jibril Rajoub, the former head of the PA's internal security force and a leading contender for a top Fatah role, said the conference was critical to achieving a "strong, unified political platform and a place to find a mechanism of how to manage the conflict with the Israelis."

Speaking to an Israeli journalist in the fluent Hebrew he picked up during his years in an Israeli prison, Rajoub said military action against Israel was still very much on the table for Fatah, despite its involvement in the peace process.

"Fatah will never give up on the armed struggle until we get our state," Rajoub said. "Until then, this is just a time out for tactical reasons."

Political observers say part of the reason for tough talk by Fatah members is an attempt to show that the party can be a viable and politically aggressive political alternative to Hamas.

In an emotional two-hour speech at the congress' opening session, Abbas talked about resolving the Hamas-Fatah split and suggested holding new elections.

"We need unity with Hamas," he said. "We know you are part of Palestine. We are two parts that connect each other and should not divide each other."

Those divisions, however, were apparent at the congress. Earlier in his speech, Abbas referred to Hamas as "coup makers," and Hamas refused to allow 400 Fatah delegates in Gaza travel to the conference in the West Bank. But several sneaked out via underground smuggling tunnels linking Gaza to Egypt, and some came by donkey. One woman even disguised herself as a Bedouin to make it across undetected.

Israel made special accommodation to allow attendance by members from enemy countries such as Syria. Fatah's old guard, some of them political exiles from countries like Lebanon and Syria who had not been in the West Bank for decades, mixed with younger Fatah members at the conference.

Israeli Arab Knesset member Ahmed Tibi was among the Israelis to attend the congress. He said that the future Palestinian state must be free of Jewish settlers and that Israeli Arabs were an inseparable part of the Palestinian people, according to media reports.

Project aims to bring every Israeli student to Jerusalem

Only half of recent high school grads have ever visited the holy city

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — While thousands of tourists flock from afar in pilgrimage to Jerusalem every year, many young Israelis have never even set foot in their country's capital.

In fact, according to Stephan Miller, an aide to Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat, only half of recent Israeli high school graduates have ever visited the holy city.

Barkat, Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar and Shimshon Shoshani, director general of the Ministry of Education, are passionate about changing this situation.

"It is an alarming statistic and a significant problem that not all Israeli students visit Jerusalem," Miller said. "Jerusalem is the capital not only of our country, but of our homeland. Mayor Barkat [along with Sa'ar and Shoshani] have acknowledged that all Israelis need to experience the city and forge a personal connection to it."

Their joint response is an educational initiative dubbed "Bring All Israeli Students to Jerusalem."

The program aims to bring every Israeli student to Jerusalem at least twice during the course of their studies – once in middle school and once in high school – for day-long tours that will include visits to government buildings, historic sites such as Ammunition Hill and Yad Vashem, Jewish spiritual sites such as the Western Wall and the City of David, as well as contemporary sites such as the city centre, the Mahane Yehuda market, museums and other cultural institutions.

"Mayor Barkat is moving forward aggressively with plans," said Miller, who explained that a steering-committee with members from the Jerusalem municipality and the Ministry of Education has been established to design the program and liaise with schools.

"Not only does he want to bring all Israeli students to Jerusalem, he wants the quality of their Jerusalem experience to be very high. This is a group effort."

Barkat, a longtime proponent of Jerusalem's economic growth, is also dedicated to education in and around the city. Prior to becoming mayor last November, the former opposition leader on city council founded Snuneet, the largest educational website in Hebrew, as well as New Spirit, an organization that aims to deepen the connections young people have to Jerusalem so that they'll remain to build their adult lives there.

"It is imperative that all students throughout Israel come to experience Jerusalem," said Barkat, who has retained the municipal education portfolio for himself.

"We intend to offer students a tour-style journey through the past, present, and future of Jerusalem. Students will be able to experience the city on many levels and create a direct connection between them and our eternal capital."

Muslim surge in EU: survey

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — One in every five people in the European Union will be Muslim by 2050, according to forecasts published in Britain's Telegraph newspaper on Sunday.

The same forecasts found that the United Kingdom, Spain and the Netherlands will have an even higher proportion of Muslims in a shorter amount of time, according to the report.

The numbers show a significant rise in the proportion of Muslims, who in 2008 made up around five per cent of the total population of the 27 EU member states.

The Telegraph report cited rising levels of immigration from Muslim countries and low birth rates among the existing European population as contributing to the shift in demographics.

The United Kingdom is also predicted to overtake Germany as the European Union's most populous country by 2060, with a projected population of 77 million people.

In related news, anti-Muslim and anti-Jewish feelings are rising in several major European countries, according to a worldwide survey released last week.

The Washington-based Pew Research Center's global attitude survey found that most Muslims in countries where they are in the majority worry about the rise of Islamic extremism at home and abroad. Majorities held that view in Indonesia, Pakistan, Tanzania, Lebanon, Egypt, Jordan and Nigeria.

Regarding respondents' attitudes toward Jews, Britain was the survey's only European country to report no significant increase in anti-Jewish attitudes since 2001, the year the survey was begun by the non-partisan Pew Research Center. Just under one in 10 British respondents held those views.

The results for 2008 found that half or more of respondents in Spain and Germany rated Muslims unfavourably: 50 per cent in Germany, compared with 46 per cent in 2004; and 52 per cent in Spain, compared with 37 per cent in 2005 and 60 per cent in 2006.

Again, the United States and Britain had the fewest respondents holding negative views of Muslims, both 23 per cent. In Britain, that was up from 18 per cent in 2004, and it was down in the United States from 31 per cent in 2004.

The survey found that people who held anti-Jewish and anti-Muslim views tended to be older and less educated than those who did not and that most anti-Semitic people were anti-Muslim as well.

Despite the increase in anti-Jewish sentiment in Europe, the deepest resentment of Jews exists outside Europe, especially where Muslims predominate. Favourable opinions of Jews rank in the single digits in Turkey, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and Pakistan.

Jordan, where close to two million Palestinians live, many as citizens, is the only predominantly Muslim country surveyed that had a positive view of the Palestinian group Hamas.

France also had the highest percentage with favourable opinions of Jews, 79 per cent. The United States had 77 per cent, Britain and Australia 73 per cent.

Netanyahu calls attack against gays 'terrorism'

The attack on a gay youth club in Tel Aviv was terrorism, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. He visited the scene of the Aug. 1 shooting attack by a masked gunman, in which Nir Katz, 26, and Liz Troboushi, 17, were killed. Four others remain in hospital, two in intensive care. A written statement from the prime minister's office said, "[The prime minister] said that the fact that somebody entered a youth centre and perpetrated a serial murder qualified the events as a terrorist attack. Prime Minister Netanyahu acknowledged that the gay community has special needs and expressed his desire to promise openness and sensitivity." Israeli police remain unsure whether the murders constitute a hate crime. "There is no clear evidence at this stage indicating that this was a hate crime," said a source involved in the investigation last week. Among the possibilities investigators are considering is that the crime was motivated by a personal dispute rather than antipathy toward gays. The police have called on Israelis not to blame any sector of the public for the crime, which shocked the nation.

Fifth swine flu death

Israel, which suffered its fifth swine flu death last week, plans to offer a vaccine for the disease to the public by January 2010. Close to 2,000 people have been diagnosed with the flu, and it's believed as many as 20,000 Israelis have been infected with the H1N1 virus.

U.S. plan in works: Barak

U.S. President Barack Obama will soon unveil a new Mideast peace initiative, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak said. Speaking to the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee, Barak said the initiative's details were still in the works. "We're in talks with them and the other regional players, including the Palestinians, are also in talks with them," Barak said, referring to negotiations with the United States. "When the initiative is formulated and presented, I think we should treat it seriously and see it as an opportunity to jump aboard while upholding Israel's defence and other vital interests."

Ruling ends segregation

A school in Emmanuel has been ordered to cease segregating Sephardi and Ashkenazi students. The Israeli Supreme Court ruled that the Beit Ya'akov girls school's practice of holding separate classes for students based on their ethnic origin was unlawful. "The right to sectarian education is not absolute, especially when it clashes with the right to equality," justices Edna Arbel, Edmond Levy and Hanan Meltzer wrote in their ruling. The judges threatened to close the school unless it complies with their ruling.

McCLELLAND & STEWART PUBLISHES LAUREN KIRSHNER'S DEBUT NOVEL WHERE WE HAVE TO GO

She's 27 years old and a graduate of the University of Toronto's masters program in English in the field of creative writing. And she's put that training to good use: Lauren Kirshner's debut novel, Where We Have to Go, was published recently by one of the country's best-known publishers, McClelland and Stewart.

The book is a "luminous and sassy" coming-of-age story focusing on Lucy Bloom as she navigates from a difficult childhood into adulthood in a family coming apart at the seams. It seems very much like a young person's novel, but even so I hope to read it as time permits this summer.

Kirshner's mentors include Margaret Atwood and M&S publisher Ellen Seligman. She is sister to Hollywood actor Mia Kirshner and daughter of longtime CJN columnist Sheldon Kirshner.

New in Print: After a first limited edition was sold out, Toronto author Kitty Wintrob's book I'm Not Going Back. Wartime Memoir of a Child Evacuee was recently picked up by Now and Then Books of Toronto, which has published it in a fine new edition. The memoir recounts Wintrob's experiences as a child from a Jewish family in wartime London, being sent to the safety of a foster home in the British countryside, and returning home on her own to her mother just as German bombs start to fall. A book launch is scheduled for Israel's Judaica, 870 Eglinton Ave. W., on Wednesday, Oct. 14, 7:30 p.m.

At the Galleries: The Institute for Contemporary Culture (ICC) of the Royal Ontario Museum is presenting two "contemporary faith-based responses to the Dead Sea Scrolls" to run alongside the ROM's current exhibition, "The Dead Sea Scrolls: Words That Changed the World."

The exhibition "Read," by visual artist Hamra Abbas, opened last week at the ROM and remains on view until the "Scrolls" engagement finishes on Jan. 3, 2010. Fresh from the National Art Gallery of Islamabad, "Read" is described as "a sculptural sound-based work that resembles a maze [and that] invites visitors to explore the role of the Islamic faith in Pakistan, Abbas' country of origin."

The piece was inspired by the artist's visits to numerous madrasahs where Islamic theology and religious law are taught. The connection to the Dead Sea Scrolls? True, Islamic theology and religious law did not arise for at least another seven or eight centuries, but perhaps the Scrolls emerged from a similar ecclesiastical environment.

"Read" is presented by the ICC and is supported by the Hal Jackman Foundation. The other ICC art installation running concurrently with the scrolls is "Margins," by New York-based artist Joshua Neustein. The work is "a poetic reflection on writing, religion and archeology [that] shapes a dialogue with the historical and cultural contexts of the Dead Sea Scrolls."

Poland's grand old man of Yiddish theatre

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

WARSAW — "My mission," Szymon Szurmiej said succinctly, "is to uphold the richness and vitality of Yiddish culture."

With these pithy words, he conveyed the raison d'etre of his life.

Now 86 and amazingly spry, he is the manager and artistic director of one of Poland's most durable postwar cultural institutions, the Ester Rachel Kaminska and Ida Kaminska State Yiddish Theatre. He is also one of its lead actors, his advanced years notwithstanding.

"I don't feel my age," he said with a sly grin.

I met him recently in Warsaw, and he was busy, with a procession of visitors filing in and out of his office, located in an unobtrusive grey building in the centre of Warsaw.

The interview was arranged by his youngest son, David, a maker of music videos and ads, and the only member of the Szurmiej family who has not so far joined the theatre.

Born in the Ukrainian town of Lutsk, Szurmiej settled in Poland in the wake of World War II. An actor before becoming a director, he worked in the cities of Wroclaw and Opole prior to joining the Yiddish theatre.

Founded in 1950, following the amalgamation of Yiddish theatres in Wroclaw and Lodz, it stages plays by the greats of the genre: Sholem Aleichem, Isaac Leib Peretz, Abraham Goldfaden, Jacob Gordin, Mendele Moykher Sforim and Peretz Hirshbein.

Szymon Szurmiej

Continuing the stellar traditions of Poland's prewar complex of Yiddish theatres, it stages its productions in a 400-seat auditorium that attracts both Yiddish and non-Yiddish speakers.

Headphones provide simultaneous translations from Yiddish to Polish.

Ida Kaminska, one of the stars of the 20th-century Yiddish stage, led the theatre in its formative years.

The daughter of the legendary Yiddish thespian Ester Kaminska, and the cousin of Hollywood actor Danny Kaye, she received an Academy Award nomination for best actress for her role in the acclaimed 1965 Czech movie, The Shop on Main Street.

Kaminska left Poland in 1968 after the pro-Soviet Polish government launched an anti-Semitic campaign under the guise of anti-Zionism. She died in the United States in 1980 after trying to resurrect her career in Israel.

Kaminska's departure was a devastating blow, but with Szurmiej's arrival in 1970, things began to look up.

Szurmiej, an energetic man endowed with drive and vision, proceeded to rebuild the theatre after Kaminska's loss.

Stratford is more than just about Shakespeare

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

The Stratford, Ont., story began with a determined World War II veteran turned journalist, Tom Patterson.

Patterson was no cultural maven, but he knew that his hometown needed a fresh venture; the town's major employer, the railway yards, were slated to close. His idea for a Shakespeare festival gained support. After all, the town already had place names such as Romeo Street, Anne Hathaway School and the Avon River. Add famous names and first-rate productions, and audiences would surely come.

When Laurence Oliver turned him down, Patterson turned to Tyrone Guthrie of the Old Vic, who became the first artistic director of what grew into the largest repertory theatre company in North America.

Actors Alec Guinness and Irene Worth headlined Stratford's debut season in 1953: six weeks, two plays, both performed in a tent. Fifty-six years later, theatregoers can choose among 14 plays, more than six months of plays and four theatres: the Avon, the Studio, the Tom Patterson, and the Festival – famed for its Elizabethan-style thrust stage.

Patterson's single-minded rescue of his hometown remains an unparalleled success story. Legends such as Lorne Green, James Mason, Nehemiah Persoff, Tammy Grimes, Martha Henry, William Hutt and Christopher Plummer number among dozens of Stratford luminaries.

A young William Shatner performed Shakespeare here in the mid-1950s, before achieving Star Trek fame. Royalty, including Queen Elizabeth II and her sister, Princess Margaret, have attended performances in a town otherwise known for the fertile farmland that surrounds it.

And make no mistake: it's not all Shakespeare; West Side Story has drawn raves this season, along with Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest. Original shows find favour as well; this summer Brian Bedford performs his one-man show to full houses reading from a moving collection of Wilde's letters.

From its inception, the festival has offered musical performances. Today, "Stratford's other festival" – almost a month of music offers an eclectic variety of performances, from barber shop to bluegrass and from classical to jazz (late July to mid-August).

This year's highlights include performances by opera and vocal tango singer Isabel Bayrakdarian, and the foot-lively organist Cameron Carpenter. Musical nights and cabarets are held in cafés, restaurants, and on a barge on the Avon River. Strolling by Victoria Lake – a widening in the river – we pass seniors listening to music from waterside benches; looking up, we meet the grin of a 10-year-old perched in the crook of a tree.

During Stratford Summer Music, "guerrilla sound events" pop out of nowhere – a woman pushing a stroller may suddenly burst into song or a married couple begin to quarrel – to the musical beat of car horns.

At Rosewood Manor, one of the town's numerous B&Bs, we find Karen Hartwick, a most unusual innkeeper. Hartwick is Canada's most highly qualified tea sommelier. She routinely asks guests whether they'd like coffee or tea in the morning.

"I have one kind of coffee and 150 kinds of tea." For most guests, the choice is obvious. A stay at Rosewood, a Victorian manor built in 1888, delivers an education in the 5,000-year-old "way of tea," originally meant to aid in meditation. Among the teas and teapots that line the shelves of her Tea Leaves Tea Tasting Bar and boutique, Hartwick shows us "tea bricks," beautifully stamped rectangles of uniform weight: this is compressed black tea. Used to ship tea to the West from Asia for hundreds of years, tea bricks still exist in parts of China.

Regularly travelling to the source of her teas, Hartwick meets with tea masters in China and Japan; she also offers the freshest-tasting Ontario organic herbal tea that you're likely to find. "I try to match the tea with the person," she says. A conversation – she also offers tastings that pair Stratford-made Rhéo Thompson chocolates with different teas – becomes a savouring of multiple fragrances and tastes, including a fermented tea that is aged 12, or even 25 years. Hartwick is living proof that Stratford fosters second acts in life as on stage: the sommelier worked in the fashion industry until tea became her passion.

Something in the Stratford air must encourage creativity. Back in 1967, the town transformed its pump house into an art gallery – water wells still remain on the property – which has become a showcase for Huron-Perth County artists as well as special exhibits.

Until Sept. 27, Gallery Stratford features the provocative photographs of Edward Burtynsky, his Manufactured Landscapes show views of snake-like Los Angeles expressways, factories in China, and the weird beauty of industrial waste. Burtynsky has donated 39 pieces to the gallery, which has long showcased his work. One floor down, you'll find a workshop where creative kids can engage in their own artistic pursuits.

In Stratford, you're never far from water and glorious gardens. Inexpensive activities include riverside picnics against the backdrop of the Avon River, gazing at what may be the country's most popular contingent of swans. Graceful (though never to be treated as pets) the swans consist of two species – the mute (white) and the black. They also possess their own toll-free number – 800-561-SWAN – and in spring they parade from their winter quarters to the river, accompanied by the Perth County Pipe Band.

When baby swans (cygnets) began to perish after eating too much tourist-supplied bread, a champion stepped forward. Eight-year-old Rachel Hacking researched what swans should be eating: dried corn (adults) and greens (cygnets). An immediate success, Rachel's Swan Food sells for a dollar in paper bags at Stratford Tourism Alliance on Downie Street. A grateful community has honoured her initiative. As for the gratitude of the swans – that's priceless.

If kids of all ages enjoy the swans, just imagine the fun offered by a tour of the Costume and Scenic Warehouse. In a vast warehouse hang 55,000 costume "units," arranged by style and period – from Greek to modern. All are available for designers seeking inspiration or for rental to theatrical companies, large and small. Volunteer guides are generous with festival facts, such as about the four milliners – "don't call them hat makers" – the Stratford Festival employs. Our guide tell us that one shimmering gown is valued at $10,000, due not only to its orangey-gold fabric but also to the 100 hours of labour that went into it.

"There's a mystical bond between director and designer," says our guide, while pointing out some deliberately "distressed" or battle-stained costumes. After passing shelves of custom-made props, we reach the "try-on" section. Donning a 16th-century-style hat and jacket, you feel instantly transformed into something magical – rather like the surprising town of Stratford itself.

For more information about Stratford and its many activities, call 800-561-7926 and/or visit www.welcometostratford.com; www.stratfordshakespearefestival.com; www.stratfordtealeaves.com.

Bologna – a city of many identities

By WOLF ARNOLD

Ah, Bologna, Bologna la grassa, Bologna the fat, as the locals say. Bologna la dotta, Bologna the learned. Citta delle torri, the city of towers. These references were true in the past, and they are true today.

Bologna has retained its reputation as Italy's capital of culinary pleasures. Pellegrino Artusi, a noted expert on Italian cuisine, wrote in his La scienca di cucina e l'arte di mangiare bene, published in 1891: "When you hear mention made of Bolognese cooking, drop a little curtsy, for it deserves it. It is a rather heavy cuisine, if you like, because the climate requires it, but how succulent it is, and what good taste it displays."

Located in Emilia Romagna, a region know for its hearty appetites, Bologna boasts restaurants that are plentiful and exceed in hospitality. The traditional cart loaded with steaming dishes is pushed from table to table, and after you order one of the local wines, a Lambrusco di Sorbara perhaps, a sparkling red and perfect choice with a Bolognese meal, let your eyes roam over your first course: the unsurpassed Tagliatelle, long strips of macaroni served with ragout sauce, butter and grated Parmesan.

Try one of the meat dishes: Cotoletta alla bolognese (slices of tender turkey breast, baked in the oven and sprinkled with white wine) or Involtini (rolls of veal, stuffed with spices and cooked in ragout).

Before or after your meal, go for a stroll along the porticoed streets and visit the Piazza Maggiore. Car traffic is banned in the centro storico, the historical centre, and you will admire the beautiful palazzi and open spaces laid out in harmonious proportions.

In the adjacent Piazza del Nettuno, the fountain of Neptune, which dates back to 1566, will enchant you. Armed with his trident, the Roman god of the sea stands in a classical pose, and at his feet are dolphin-riding sirens with water spouting from their breasts. The fountain was praised by the French philosopher, Montaigne, in his Journeys in Italy, in 1580. Some 200 years later, the German poet and statesman Goethe rested at the fountain when he passed through Bologna on his way to Rome.

If you feel a little adventurous, try to climb the 500 steps up Bologna's own leaning tower, the Torre di Asinelli, from which a fine view of the townscape and surrounding country can be enjoyed. Goethe climbed it and so can you. The tower was built in 1109 and leans some two metres out of its vertical axis. It reaches a height of 100 metres and dominates its twin, the truncated Torre Garisenda standing beside it. When Charles Dickens visited Bologna, he remarked: "They bow to each other, stiff and strange."

In medieval times, no fewer than 180 towers rose above the rooftops of the city. Built mainly for defence between feuding families, the height of the towers also indicated their owners' social status. While a student in Bologna, the great poet Dante gave the towers a place in his first works.

Learning was always a Bologna hallmark. Its university is the oldest in Europe. Founded in the 11th century and then known as the "studio," it excelled in the field of law. Later, during the age of scientific discoveries, the Instituto delle Scienze was founded, and one of its members, Luigi Galvani, discovered the phenomenon that we now call electricity. Another famous son of Bologna, Guglielmo Marconi, gave the world wireless communication.

Music was not far behind in the city. In the 17th century, it attracted the masters of the Italian high baroque, including Arcangelo Corelli and Giuseppe Torelli. The young Mozart, just 14 years old, was given the title of compositore by the esteemed Accademia Filarmonica. And Gioacchino Rossini, who grew up in Bologna, stood on the stage of the Teatro Comunale as a singer at the age of 13.

But the soul of Bologna is found in its principal streets. Designed in an orderly fashion and flanked by porticoes, they give the city a stupendous appearance. These arcades are part of every house and were compulsory in medieval times for every dwelling built. Strict rules governed their size and height so that a man on horseback could easily pass under them.

Beneath these arches, as the sun casts a pattern of light and shadow, life pulses more intensely, and being an extension of their homes, the porticoes express the hospitality of the Bolognese people. Admittedly, Bologna does not have the same evocative ring to its name as Venice and Florence do, but the ochre-coloured townscape with its lively squares and arcaded streets lend a special character to the city.

If you go: Bologna is on the northern approaches of the Apennine Mountains at the convergence of two Autostradas, the most famous being the Autostrada del Sol, the Motorway to the Sun, which crosses the Appennines and passes through 25 tunnels and over 45 bridges before reaching Florence. Train connections are excellent from all Italian centres.

Brutally honest comedian examines his failed relationships

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

Marc Maron, a seasoned comedian and divorcé, describes himself as a typical passionate male — defensive, hostile and completely charming.

Maron recently brought his successful standup comedy act, Scorching the Earth, to Theatre Ste. Catherine in Montreal. The show, which ran July 16 to 25, consisted of a mostly autobiographical tale of Maron's two failed marriages.

Scorching the Earth was part of Zoofest, a new festival showcasing dozens of shows that run in conjunction with the Just for Laughs Festival.

As the lights came up on stage on opening night, the audience saw nothing but a painting of a bright, smiling clown and an imposing, frowning Jewish man. A New York native, Maron definitely fits the profile of an angry comic, reminiscent of a modern-day George Costanza with better hair. "I wake up seething every day," he said. "I open my eyes, and I'm like, 'This again, really?'"

Maron's jokes tend toward the vulgar side; he sandwiches poignant cultural and psychological insights between expletives and talk about illegal substances, and certain unmentionable body parts. Describing his addictive personality, he said, "I used to do a lot of drugs, but stopped – not because I didn't like the effects, but because I couldn't handle the commitment."

Throughout the one-hour show he left no ugly stone of divorce unturned, revealing how he got through the worst parts of his life with the help of his two friends: the "go-to" guy, and the guy he goes to when his other go-to guy is tired of listening to him.

When asked if he has any advice for aspiring divorcés, Maron strongly advises against hiring lawyers, instead recommending mediation. In addition to their outlandish fees, he warned that lawyers "destroy everything."

Marc Maron jokes about his two marriages.

Indeed, Maron is at times brutally honest and self-critical as he examines his two failed relationships. "I think I come off pretty badly in the show," he said in an interview with The CJN. "Or at least, I like to think I'm fairly hard on myself in this routine."

It is this very self-effacing and almost painfully honest nature of his performance that makes the show so relatable and entertaining for his slightly uncomfortable audience. Maron even divulged what he learned about himself in couples counselling, which he refers to in the show as "that thing men do when they want to pay someone else to ambush them."

But Maron is, after all, a comedian, and despite the dark personal tone of his show, he managed to get in some fantastic punch lines and find the humour in even the most tragic of situations.

"Of course, I was devastated when Mischa [his second wife] left me. But on some level, there was a part of me that was like, 'Good for you, honey. I've been trying to leave me for years,'" Maron said, laughing.

He also let the audience in on some happier moments, such as the time he ran into his ex-wife while he was walking down the street with a gorgeous blonde fan.

Of course, this was a different ex-wife altogether. Prior to his second marriage, Maron was married to Kimberly Reiss, in a relationship he describes as "ridiculous."

"I was married for a while, and then I stopped."

He joked that marrying a Jew meant everything that bugged him growing up was suddenly in his home again.

Reflecting on his upbringing, Maron conceded that despite his best efforts, he was unable to avoid the trappings of being a Jewish comic.

"I spent my life trying to run away from all that, only to find that in the end, you can't avoid it," he said in our interview.

He seasons his show with his thoughts on religion, and, not unlike many comedians today, makes cracks about his Jewish mother.

He has worked for years as a successful writer, actor and comedian, producing three CDs – Not Sold Out (2002), Tickets Still Available (2006) and Final Engagement (2009).

Before hosting the aptly named Marc Maron Show in 2006, he set a record by making more than 40 appearances on Late Night with Conan O'Brien. He's been featured on HBO specials alongside Jon Stewart, Denis Leary and Steven Wright, and co-hosted Breakroom Live and Morning Sedition.

His one-man show, Jerusalem Syndrome: My Life as a Reluctant Messiah, had an extended off-Broadway run, and a book under the same name was released in 2001. Perhaps the most impressive thing about Maron is that he manages not to mention any of these achievements in his act or in his interview.

Despite his success, Maron revealed that he still gets nervous before every performance.

"I pause for a minute before every show I do, and I say to myself, 'I know how to do this, right?' I ask it as a question to myself."

Szurmiej is convinced Yiddish theatre will endure

"We went through some very hard moments," he said. "It wasn't easy."

Szurmiej agrees that the flight of thousands of Jews from Poland after 1968 represented an enormous loss for the country. "Poland, due to these events, is all the poorer," he noted. "Polish culture is poorer without Yiddish culture."

Nonetheless, he argued that Yiddish culture is not any more vigorous now than it was before the end of the Communist era in 1989.

The former president of the Socio-Cultural Association of Jews in Poland, Szurmiej is the grand old man of Yiddish theatre in Poland today.

For almost 40 years, he has been at the helm of the theatre he loves, staging performances several times a week in Warsaw and taking the theatre on tours of both Poland and abroad, including Canada and the United States.

"We make them laugh and cry," he said. "We get the greatest satisfaction from these tours."

Szurmiej is convinced that Yiddish theatre will endure, though many obituaries already have been written about the imminent demise of Yiddish.

"Yiddish is a culture no one has to be ashamed of," he said in an understatement. "It can't be allowed to disappear."

In recognition of his contributions, he was awarded one of Poland's most prestigious awards, the Grand Cross of the Order of Poland, several years ago.

Spiritual self-discovery can keep you in stitches

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

See that knitter on the subway, park bench or at the dentist? Curious who first gave life to those busy needles in her hands? The odds-on favourite: her grandmother.

Just ask Toronto's Rosanne Bernard, author of Knittishisms, whose bubbie taught her during summer vacation; ditto Brooklyn native Linda Skolnik, co-author of The Knitting Way, who discovered only years later that she'd been mentored in an eastern European style of stitch by her Russian immigrant grandmother.

Think of the bubbie factor as the "cast on" in knitting: without that jump-start row of stitches, that pretty ball of yarn can't morph into a comfy sweater or cosy pair of socks.

Don't be intimidated by the language of knitting: this reviewer doesn't know a purl from a garter stitch, and confuses "stockinettes" with a 1960s Motown girl group. As for "gauge" and "blocking," isn't that what football players do? But upon entering the click-clack mindset of the amusing Bernard, or the spiritual dimension of Skolnik (and co-author Janice MacDaniels), one gains a new-found appreciation for all that knitting has to offer.

Let's start with Bernard, a 45-year-old married mother of two whose primer on the zen of Jewish knitting (penned under her "fibre name" Rebel Knitter and published by The Schneider's Tochter) will keep you in... stitches. A long-standing member of a "knit and kvetch" group – The Secret Society for the Propogation of Fibre Pornography – Bernard lives knitting through a prism of Jewish language, practice and tradition.

She writes like she talks: zippy (she is, after all, an ex-Montrealer), relying on a stash of witty backtalk from her knit buddies, as well as knitting-related family anecdotes.

In her world, knitters merit a special brachah (Birkat Hasaroget), their own ketubah and the protection of a get (attention sweater-recipient ex-husbands). And with the moral authority of the local mikvah lady, Bernard defends the sanctity of keeping a kosher knitting home.

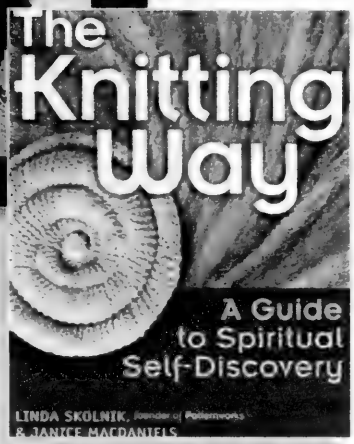
"Treif yarn is chaloshes yarn... it's that nasty, synthetic fibre... Essentially, it grosses you out when you touch it," she writes.

No such yarn for her. From the numerous colour photos, Bernard does indeed do wondrous things with a ball of wool and a pair of bamboo needles. A knitting melamed at heart ("I'll teach you!" she chirps on the phone), she stocks her pages with instructions and patterns for kippot, socks and a kid's sweater with a motif to stop schoolyard bullies cold.

If Knittishisms refreshes like a glass of punch, then The Knitting Way: A Guide to Spiritual Self-Discovery (SkyLight Paths Publishing) goes down like a soothing cup of tea. Skolnick (famously known to knitters for her former mail-order business Patternworks) and veteran knitter MacDaniels trace the centuries-old female tradition of knitting (alone or in groups), its significance to generations of women (from financial sustenance to friendship) and knitting's recent revival in popularity (thanks to celebrity cachet), particularly among a younger demographic.



The book is thoughtful and thought-provoking; one appreciates knitting's ripple effect on mind and body as extolled by the authors: "Let your hands dance with the wool"; listen to the "symphony of fibres."

The writing moves easily back and forth between Skolnik and MacDaniels, both of whom have good stories to tell in that life-experience way of certain middle-aged women. It's a real pleasure to read how and for whom they knit, and what creations fly off their needles.

Chock-full of pictures and instructions (who knew there was such a thing as a sock's turned heel?), the book also reveals a deeply spiritual side—from knitting's quiet, contemplative atmosphere that can function as a "partner in prayer" to the knitter's soul-stirring appreciation of the green hills that nurtured the sheep.

Even if the act of knitting doesn't grab you this way, what knitter (or other crafts person) couldn't relate to the authors' simple truism: that our knitting projects are time capsules, tangible reminders of that seaside vacation or hospital bedside where this scarf or that blanket took shape.

Although Skolnik gives just a passing nod to the interplay between knitting and Judaism, it pops up occasionally, from her use of the word "ongepatchket," which describes one of her sweater designs, to a group effort knitting afghans for the needy on Mitzvah Day at the local Jewish community centre.

While learning to knit is a lost cause for me, quilting seems more do-able (maybe because I'm a big fan of patchwork quilts, and they don't itch like wool). So it comes as a pleasant surprise to find Louise Silk's The Quilting Path: A Guide to Spiritual Discovery Through Fabric, Thread and Kabbalah.

Another in the SkyLight Paths series on crafts and spirituality, Silk's book is as personal as it is practical. Describing herself as "a quilting mystic born into a Jewish culture following a Buddhist practice," she applies the 10 Divine Attributes found in Kabbalah to the quilting process. Stick with its intricacies and you'll be rewarded with some fascinating insights.

Even if Kabbalah's not your thing, the book fires up the imagination with excellent diagrams and explanations of quilting patterns. Make sure to check out Silk's T-shirt quilt and quilting carryall bag made from an old pair of jeans. Simply divine.

ANCIENT QUARRY ON MODERN THOROUGHFARE: An ancient quarry, measuring one square dunam in area (about a quarter of an acre), dating from the Second Temple period was recently discovered on Shmuel Hanvi Street in Jerusalem. Ofer Sion, the excavation director, said that stones quarried there were used by Herod to build the walls of the Temple.

Shnaider sells Tel Aviv soccer team to fellow Canadian

By MOSHE BOKER
and DAVID MAROUANI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Speculation is brewing as to why Alex Shnaider, the Russian-born Canadian billionaire businessman, relinquished 80 per cent of his control in Maccabi Tel Aviv to Toronto real estate developer Mitchell Goldhar for what is reputed to be virtually nothing in return.

The sale to Goldhar has been sealed and no details released, but Shnaider recently rejected an offer to sell the soccer club for NIS 32 million ($8.8 million Cdn.) for half of his shares.

Alex Shnaider

Officials at the Maccabi Tel Aviv umbrella organization – which also runs basketball, handball and other clubs by the same name – are struggling to understand what's going through Shnaider's mind.

"It's illogical," said one official. "We don't know a single... businessperson who would sell Maccabi for free, especially when just recently he asked for 50 million shekels for the team and at the same time tightened the purse strings and kept track of every shekel the club was spending."

Shnaider, 41, is the co-founder of Midland Group, an international trading and investment holding company with interests in manufacturing, real estate, shipping and steel. He has partnered with Donald Trump for the construction of the Trump International Hotel & Tower condominium in Toronto, the city's tallest residential tower, keeping the $20-million penthouse suite for himself.

Goldhar is sole proprietor of SmartCentres, a retail developer, and owns a 25 per cent stake in Calloway Real Estate Investment Trust.

A Maccabi official said "the deal between Shnaider and Goldhar is completely sealed. The two of them arrived at a total understanding and now it's only the management which can prevent them from carrying out the deal." Reports indicate Goldhar will have the option of purchasing the remaining 20 per cent of the club from Israeli businessmen.

So what happened? It seems Shnaider's move stemmed at least in part from turbulent relations between the owner and the umbrella organization, which at a certain point stopped supporting him over concerns he was indecisive and flip-flopped on key issues.

Responding to fans' concerns as training camp got underway, club general manager Uzi Shaya said, "Believe me that we tried everything, but it doesn't interest him.

"Shnaider said he's not willing to invest more than an hour a day in Maccabi. I swear to you, I call him and he doesn't respond.

"Here, take his phone number and e-mail, maybe he'll listen to you," the general manager told stunned fans.

Calls to Shnaider and Goldhar from The CJN were not returned.

Sources at the Maccabi Tel Aviv umbrella group, which owns 20 per cent of the club, believe Shnaider has no intention of relinquishing control of the team he acquired two years ago for the hefty fee of NIS 96 million ($26.4 million Cdn. in today's funds). Instead, they believe that while Shnaider will remain the club's de facto "decider" by streaming money to the club's new proprietors, he may no longer hold the title of owner.

Eldad Buchspan, chair of the Maccabi Tel Aviv group, said "nobody has talked to us about anything. It's unacceptable that we'd be disinherited from the 20 per cent of the shares we have in the team."

"We'd be happy if Shnaider stayed," he said, adding that, "we won't prevent Shnaider from selling his shares, but if that happens, it must be in an organized, supervised way."

Signs of hope — an outsider's perspective

By BETH PORTER

Guest Voice

"Everybody wants that—but it won't happen," commented the young man who served me an espresso in a little shop on Yafo Road. Israeli radio was once again airing U.S. President Barack Obama's Cairo declaration of his commitment to a two-state solution. Of course, the young man and I both know that not "everybody" wants it, but I choose to hope that in time it can happen, like other miracles of international import over the centuries. In Jerusalem during June as part of a short sabbatical, I wanted to learn about some of the small bridge-building initiatives that rarely garner media coverage.

For some years, I have received e-mail reports from Interfaith Encounter Association (IEA) groups in Israel. They provide a platform for getting to know "the other" by sharing knowledge of religious and cultural customs — non-threatening topics of mutual interest. In Jerusalem, I met Yehuda Stolov, an Orthodox Jew with a PhD in physics who, influenced in yeshiva by Rav Abraham Isaac Kook's open-mindedness and in university by positive experiences in similar groups, founded IEA in 2001. He estimates 4,000 people participated last year. "The long-term hope is that when people develop genuine relationships they will not want to treat one another in ways that diminish or dehumanize," he explained.

I attended an IEA group at the Swedish Theological Center. The co-chairs were both women, an Arab teacher and a Holocaust survivor. After an hour's discussion, the 12 of us broke for refreshments and socializing – an important part of IEA meetings. I talked with Abdallah, a Muslim Arab-Israeli from east Jerusalem, where schools are poorer, parks and play areas that west Jerusalem families enjoy are lacking, and building permits that could help relieve overcrowding are almost impossible to obtain. "We need to learn to live together," he said of his participation in the dialogue.

Abdallah's university education was interrupted by the first intifadah, but he chose to learn Hebrew, has Israeli citizenship and works for the Jerusalem municipality. He chooses not to withdraw into bitterness but to speak for change where he can and to make the best of the situation. He uses opportunities that exist, even driving his children some distance to the playground of a kibbutz. I believe all Israelis should pay attention to people such as Abdallah. That east Jerusalem children not grow up isolated and angry should be of great concern.

I also met an interdisciplinary group of Israeli academics hoping to create a not-for-profit Mindfulness educational centre, because they believe Mindfulness techniques would be helpful for citizens' dialogue groups, negotiators and even in military training. Mindfulness is an approach to meditation whose object is to help individuals develop self-awareness so they can recognize immediately the inner "tapes" they tend to replay from the past and allow space for different attitudes and expectations.

One presenter explained, "Just awareness and acknowledgment of asymmetry in the situations of Israelis and Palestinians can sometimes get a group unstuck."

I also had other experiences: a Shabbat with peace activist friends who described the sad fading of friendships they had nurtured with people in Beit Sahour who live beyond the security wall, where they can no longer visit, and meeting a rabbi at an interfaith trialogue who said, "[Jewish and Muslim leaders] are concerned about the five per cent who are radicals, but it's the 95 per cent who say nothing who should concern us."

Relationships in which genuine care for the other can grow, or has already grown, need to be encouraged and sustained, because they represent part of a foundation of hope.

Beth Porter has long been involved in Christian-Jewish dialogue and Holocaust education. She is director of educational Initiatives for L'Arche Canada.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

VIEW OF BATHURST STREET, 1935

This is Bathurst Street at Roselawn Avenue, looking north in 1935. In the post-war era, Bathurst became the central corridor of Toronto's Jewish community, crowded with bagel restaurants, retail shops, shteibls, grocery stores and apartment blocks, but here it still looks like a country road. To the south, below Eglinton, Jewish families had begun to move into Forest Hill and ground would soon be broken for the Holy Blossom Temple. But in the 1930s there was very little Jewish presence along this stretch of Bathurst, except for the Roselawn Cemetery a block to the east of the camera position.

Father and son

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I'm going to tell you a story of a father and son who love each other very much.

The story began this past March, when the boy said to his father that he wanted to go to camp. He was eager to go to a place in the north where Jewish boys would sleep in old, flimsy cabins and play capture the flag in the surrounding woods.

The father agreed. He was elated about the idea of his son attending sleep-over camp, something he had done in his younger years. He was delighted that his pre-bar mitzvah boy would be a camper at the same camp he had spent summers in and might just see his name scribbled on a beam in a cabin.

All of the boy's clothes had his name sewn in. His bag was packed with the things on the camp list, including Jewish books for learning. Everything was Jake.

The two of them, father and son, were the first ones to arrive at the spot where the bus would take the campers northward.

The father was ready for this day, at least in part. He had heard from friends that he may be lonely while his son was away. A friend told him that his father had slept in his bed while he was in camp, because he missed him so much. But the father was okay.

The boy was all ready. He laughed and joked with his dad while they loaded his stuff on the bus. He appeared to be happy about leaving the city, heading to our beautiful north, and hanging with guys in a Jewish summer place.

A day went by. The father was happy to have received a call that the bus had arrived safely. The first round was over.

Two days went by, then three. The son phoned his father, but missed him twice. He sounded upset on the message.

Finally, after four days, the two spoke. The father missed his son a lot but didn't let on. He felt like the energy of youth was missing from his life. His boy was in tears on the phone and said, "Daddy, I want to come home. I miss you."

The father told his boy he missed him, too, and held back his tears. He let his only son know he should do his best to hang in there, to stick it out, but if he really wanted to come home, he could.

A day went by and his boy called again. He was crying. Camp wasn't nearly as much fun as being with his dad, and not all the guys were nice. The boy was just so homesick and cried every day.

The father spoke softly to his son, telling him he might try to stay until visiting day. The boy said he would. Shabbat was approaching and the father was so down, feeling so lonely for his boy. He said the silence volume at home was high, and he was searching for ways to turn it down.

The phone rang. The father answered hurriedly. The young boy was in tears. The father held back his. He told his son that whatever he wanted to do was okay by him and he would come pick him up on Sunday if he wanted. "Don't feel badly about coming home," Dad said. "A lot of kids do."

The boy said he would try and stay for a bit.

The father said, "Soon we will be together again, hugging, kissing and playing. But today I have love in my heart that I can access anytime I want."

Shabbat was coming and they had to hang up.

Parents upset at Maccabiah accommodations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Parents and athletes returning from the Maccabiah Games in Israel say junior athletes endured substandard accommodation that included cockroach-infested rooms, long waits for transportation, skimpy food and brown tap water.

They are angry at the disparity between the comfortable hotel accommodation for older athletes and the hardships endured by their teenaged children, especially since they paid the same $7,500 to Maccabi Canada that the older athletes did.

"It was a comedy of errors," said one parent, who requested anonymity to spare her child embarrassment. "They were not mistreated, but they were not treated in a way we expected them to be treated when we sent them on this trip."

Maccabi Canada is acknowledging there were inadequacies in the accommodations. Allen Gerskup, president of the organization, said Maccabi's executive met late last week and the parents' complaints were top of the agenda.

"We're looking at it. We are aware of the concerns of the parents. We're not taking it lightly. They just need to give us time to investigate it and see if everything we should have been doing was done."

The mother, who was not in Israel for the Games, said her son's team had to wait 10 hours on arrival before they were given a room. The next day they were moved into rooms that were dirty and bug-ridden, she said.

The tap water was brown and "the kids used to joke it was the cockroaches," she said.

Little consideration was given for their schedules, so if they missed a meal because of a game, there was no food waiting for them when they returned. On one occasion, the team waited 3-1/2 hours after playing a game in 30-degree heat before being taken back to the athletes village, she said.

Canada's junior athletes were housed at the Neve Hadassah youth village near Netanya. The parent said Maccabi Canada's response to the poor conditions was inadequate, and she contrasted it to the British team's reaction.

The Jewish Chronicle of London reported that young British athletes were "relocated to a five-star hotel by Team Great Britain bosses after just 24 hours due to health and safety concerns."

One of the junior Canadian athletes said conditions "were pretty bad. We got there at 2 p.m. and didn't get in [to a room] until 10:30 at night."

They were moved the next day. The first room did have some cockroaches, but the second one wasn't bad, he said, though it was crowded.

Expecting four to a room, two additional teammates were given mattresses and joined them because of a shortage of space.

Though they were told by Maccabi officials to drink the tap water while at the village and bottled water at games, their trainer advised them to stick to bottled water all the time. "We bought our water" at a canteen, he said.

"Most of us ate there," he said. "The food was a lot better than the food we were given. Sometimes we didn't know what it was. It didn't taste good… It's not something you give an athlete before competition."

A second parent told The CJN inadequate food was a persistent problem for her son's team. The athletes were denied seconds when they asked for it, and on returning from games, they would find meals would not be waiting for them.

She said security was inadequate. The rooms could not be locked and her son's wallet and $200 (US) was stolen. Other athletes had an iPod and and a cellphone taken, she said.

Britain pulled its athletes out of substandard accommodations, and "Maccabi Canada should have done something similar," she added.

Maccabi Canada will discuss the situation with every parent. So far, athletes in smaller centres like Winnipeg and Calgary have already been called by local Maccabi officials.

The purpose of the calls is "to explain what the situation was and to assure them something like this won't happen again," Gerskup said.

Maccabi Canada believed housing the young athletes in a youth village would provide them "with an Israeli experience a kibbutz/boarding school type of environment."

Gerskup said the first day was difficult and many had to wait for rooms. "We had everything set up, but it became a mad scramble for accommodations."

After the first night, the youngsters were put up adequately, he said.

As for the cockroaches, "It's Israel. They are going to be everywhere," he said.

Once informed of the problem, an exterminator was called and it was dealt with. A cleaning crew was also summoned after complaints were received, he added.

Gerskup dismissed critiques of the quality of the food, comparing it to summer camps where some campers like the food and others don't.

As to the security issue, he acknowledged problems, but the doors were such that locks could not be attached.

"Yes, there were problems," Gerskup said. "When we heard about it, we took care of it. Ninety-five per cent of the people were happy."

"They had a great time and a great Israeli experience."

Despite the difficulties at the youth village, the young athlete does not regret the trip.

"I'm still happy I went. It could have been a lot better, but we made the best of it."

But, he added a caveat: "If they were trying to get us to live in Israel, it really wasn't the best example."

UCC's anti-Israel resolutions shelved

Reactions to the outcome range from optimism to contempt

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

After much prayer and debate last week, the United Church of Canada chose to remain pro-Israel, at least on a national level and for the time being.

Over two days of voting and discussion at its 40th general council last week in Kelowna, B.C., the church first rejected the use of what they termed "hurtful" and "unbalanced" language in the companion material to the economic boycott resolutions proposed by some church members – which included statements equating Israel's treatment of Palestinians to South African apartheid, accused Israel of "ethnic cleansing" and implied that some Canadian politicians had dual loyalties to Canada and Israel – before finally voting down the resolutions altogether on Aug. 13.

The result of the vote came as a relief to much of the Canadian Jewish community, after many of its lay leaders denounced the church's anti-Israel material in the weeks prior to the general council.

The general council, the church's highest decision-making body, is convened triennially.

But the church didn't completely close the door on the subject.

"The United Church has not begun or approved a boycott [of Israel] on a national level," Rev. Bruce Gregersen, a church spokesperson, said in a statement on the general council website.

"However, [the church] has stated its encouragement and recommendation to its member bodies… that they are free to study, discern and to pray on how to undertake their own initiatives, which may include an economic boycott [of Israel] as a means to ending the occupation."

Bitter Birthday

A rally and prayer service were held last week at the Western Wall to mark kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit's upcoming 23rd birthday and his third year in captivity. "We are not optimistic," Schalit's father, Noam, seen alongside former Ashkenazi chief rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, told hundreds of people at the Wall. Rabbi Lau was joined at the rally by several of Israel's most influential rabbis. Earlier in the week, a Hamas leader said his group is not any closer to releasing Schalit, despite reports to the contrary that had circulated in Britain. Abu Mujahid, a spokesperson for the Popular Resistance Committees, the group responsible for Schalit's capture, told the Ma'an Palestinian news agency that its demands for the release of 1,400 Palestinians in Israeli jails has not changed. Amnesty International issued a statement calling on Hamas to allow the Red Cross and the Schalit family to visit the soldier.

The News in Brief

Canada

Trio Facing Charges

VANCOUVER — The RCMP is recommending hate charges against three drunken men in their mid-20s who painted swastikas and anti-Semitic slurs on their bodies and clothes and shouted racist comments at people in Ucluelet, B.C. Police were called July 31 when the men yelled epithets from a boat at people on shore in the town on the west coast of Vancouver Island. They also walked around the downtown. No particular group or person was targeted and the men aren't members of a hate group. They were released Aug. 5 and are to appear in court next month

World

Base Makes Changes

ATLANTA — A major U.S. Army base has added kosher food and a rabbi-chaplain after a Jewish soldier was beaten. The move at Fort Benning, near Columbus, Ga., came after 20-year-old Pvt. Michael Handman suffered a concussion when a fellow soldier beat him during basic training last fall, according to Army Times. The soldier accused of the beating was discharged, and two drill sergeants were disciplined. One told Handman to remove his kippah in a dining hall. The other allegedly called him "Juden," German for Jewish. Earlier this month, the base added a rabbi as its full-time Jewish chaplain, kosher prepackaged meals are now available in the mess hall, and the base will hold Shabbat and High Holiday services instead of busing Jewish soldiers to a nearby shul.

Groups File Brief

NEW YORK — Three Orthodox groups asked a New York appellate court to defend the viability of the Jewish beit din court system from interference by secular courts. The Orthodox Union, Agudath Israel of America and Torah U'Mesorah filed an amicus brief in the case of Brisman vs. Hebrew Academy of the Five Towns & Rockaway. In it, a teacher at the Long Island academy was fired because of a dispute over religious philosophy, but the Beit Din of America ruled for the teacher. The school challenged the ruling in state appeals court and had it overruled. The brief argues that the trial court "unconstitutionally interfered in a religious dispute" and "incorrectly ignored the parties' arbitration contract which provided that their dispute would be settled in the beit din," therefore undermining the the Jewish beit din system and infringing on First Amendment rights.

Crash Killed Brothers

NEW YORK — The deaths of three members of a close-knit family in a midair collision over the Hudson River is a "real heartbreak," a family member said. Steven Altman, 60, was piloting a small plane carrying his brother Daniel Altman, 49, and Daniel's son Doug, 15, when it collided Aug. 8 with a helicopter carrying five Italian tourists and its pilot. There were no survivors. The Altmans are from the Philadelphia area. The family owns a construction and real-estate firm founded by Steven's father, David, a World War II hero and aviation aficionado.

Ex-Nazi Sentenced

BERLIN — A former Nazi lieutenant was sentenced to life in jail for ordering the murder of Italian civilians in June 1944. Josef Scheungraber, 90, was found guilty Aug. 11 by a Munich court of 10 of 14 murders he was charged with. The ex- Wehrmacht lieutenant had been living for decades in a town outside Munich, where he served on town council.

IDF Officer Faced Prosecution Threat

JOHANNESBURG — A former South African cabinet minister and two NGOs called for war crimes charges against an Israeli soldier visiting the country.

David Benjamin, a former South African who is a lieutenant colonel in the Israel Defence Forces, came to South Africa to speak at three Limmud events on the subject of legal issues of warfare.

Activist Zackie Achmat called the invitation of Benjamin, the IDF's legal adviser on Gaza from 2001 to 2005, "the equivalent of inviting Sudanese President Ali Bashir to a conference on genocide." The Palestine Solidarity Committee also called Benjamin a war criminal.

Limmud, a global Jewish identity conference, defended the invitation, while the South African Jewish Board of Deputies and the South African Zionist Federation said calls for Benjamin's prosecution were an attempt to demonize Israel.

Meanwhile, a former South African intelligence minister, Communist Party leader Ronnie Kasrils, who is Jewish, submitted a 3,500-page "Gaza docket" to a variety of government bodies calling for the prosecution of Benjamin and 70 other former South Africans living in Israel who hold dual citizenship. It was unlikely any action would be taken against Benjamin while he was in South Africa.

Shoah Denier Jailed

SYDNEY — A German-born Holocaust denier living in Australia was jailed for three months, ending a 13-year legal battle. Fredrick Toben, director of the Adelaide Institute in South Australia, an anti-Semitic and Holocaust-denying organization, lost his appeal this month in Federal Court to overturn his conviction for contempt of court. Toben, 64, was found guilty earlier this year on 24 counts of contempt of a 2002 court order to remove anti-Semitic material on his website that included claims that gas chambers did not exist at Auschwitz and that the Holocaust was "a lie." The long-running case began in 1996 when a president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry accused Toben of breaching the Racial Vilification Act. Last week, Toben's website included a notice that read, "It is the contention of this site that the Holocaust does not exist in reality ... We have no malice towards Jews, and we wish them well in their struggle to escape their own enslavement."

Koffler aims to inject Jewish culture into city scene

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Evelyn Tauben, the Koffler Centre for the Arts' head of programs and exhibitions, wants to use the centre to create a Jewish cultural scene in Toronto.

"It can help us think about the Jewish experience in different ways and also find points of connection with other cultures," said Tauben, a Montreal native who has been living in Toronto for the past 18 months.

"This city is so right for that kind of work. Part of my vision is that – multiculturalism and diversity are big buzz words in Toronto – but we have to continuously push that Jewish culture plays a role in that mix. We don't see Jewish culture as only being accessible to Jews."

–At only 30 years old, Tauben already has a lot of experience combining her training in art history with her personal passion for the Jewish community and culture.

As a McGill University student, Tauben studied English literature, art history and Jewish studies, and even spent a semester studying at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

After graduating, she went to Washington, D.C., where she got a position at the Smithsonian National Museum of Natural History.

Evelyn Tauben

From there, she moved to Philadelphia and obtained a master's in art history while working at the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

While studying in Philadelphia, it occurred to Tauben that she had something unique to offer the Philadelphia Jewish community. Having attended Jewish day school in Montreal, she and her peers were taught to speak Yiddish since the first grade.

She said when others learned that she could speak Yiddish, they found it funny and questioned why she needed to speak a dying language.

"Yiddish is culture, theatre, music, literature, film... I just decided that I wanted to bring Yiddish culture to my group, specifically to those in their 20s and 30s," Tauben said.

She planned a series of events in 2006 called Youngish and Yiddish.

"One [event] was with [musician] SoCalled, one was with [author] Michael Wex – two Canadians who came to Philadelphia – and one was with a young author named Sam Apple from New York. We offered Yiddish classes for people in their 20s and 30s. It was really a huge success, beyond my wildest dreams. I just wanted to do it."

Tauben said that the success of Youngish and Yiddish led organizations, musicians and artists to contact her about organizing other events in Philadelphia.

And here's to you, Mrs. Robinson

"And here's to you, Mrs. Robinson
We'd like to know a little bit about you for our files." (Paul Simon)

From the editor's desk...

Unfortunately, we know quite a bit about Mrs. Robinson, that is. Mrs Mary Robinson, the former president of Ireland. Our files are thick with the press clippings of her very public remonstrations against the Jewish state. To this very day, this particular Mrs. Robinson has been a sharp-tongued, relentless critic of Israel.

The most compelling entry in the file relates to her role as the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights during the years 1997 to 2002, the highlight of which was overseeing the World Conference Against Racism that was held in Durban, South Africa, in 2001.

Of course, eight years later, we recall that conference to have achieved the very opposite of its purported purpose. In a calculated, deliberate manner, the conference fomented rather than railed against racism.

Almost every Jew who was in Durban then reported with horror and shock upon the vicious nature and ubiquitous extent of the brazen, medieval ill will toward the State of Israel and toward Jews.

Eminent Canadians such as MP Irwin Cotler and former Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy were at the conference. They experienced it as a hatefest toward Jews and Israel.

"Hate, not hope, had carried the day," wrote Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, of the 2001 Durban conference. He was a spokesperson for the Jewish caucus at the conference.

For most Jews around the world, the Durban conference was a watershed, a reawakening. Much like the disbelief so many Jews felt regarding the passivity and even acquiescence of the world to the impending destruction of the 19-year-old Jewish state in early June 1967, Durban forced us to face a truth we did not see or which we refused to see: the defeat of the Nazis did not also spell the defeat of anti-Semitism.

The 2001 Durban Conference was a paving stone along the same path trod by the ideological inheritors of the leaders of the Third Reich, demonizing, marginalizing, delegitimizing and ultimately aiming to cast out the Jewish state from within the international family of nation states.

But Mrs. Robinson didn't quite see it that way. As former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton noted last week, in 2002, Robinson described Durban's outcome as "remarkably good, including on the issues of the Middle East."

Robinson was the head of the 2001 Durban process. She sat like Madame Dafarge in A Tale of Two Cities at her seat near the guillotine, sometime stoic but mostly fawning approval of the parade of frenzied anti-Israel bashers and anti-Semites who passed enthusiastically before her in their hysteria and hatred.

On the eve of Israel's war with Hamas last December, she opined, "I cannot believe that Israeli ordinary people understand what is being done in their name; they couldn't possibly support it if they did." After the war began, while calling on Hamas to stop firing missiles into Israel, she accused Israel of having contravened "international legal norms relating in particular to proportionality and collective punishment."

The file on Mrs. Mary Robinson veritably bursts at the seams in the sub-folder labelled "Israel." Quite naturally therefore, many observers were puzzled, to say the least, when the White House announced she was to be among 16 recipients of the Presidential Medal of Freedom, the highest civilian honour in the United States. Some even urged the White House to reconsider granting the medal to Robinson. "What was President Barack Obama thinking?" they asked out loud, to honour Durban's director with so prestigious an honour?

And, as if proving her critics' point, Mrs. Robinson responded by pointing her finger at her favourite target. "There's a lot of bullying by certain elements of the Jewish community," she told the Irish media. "They bully people who try to address the severe situation in Gaza and the West Bank."

The Jews defend Israel. We answer the false charges and more importantly, we stand up to the accusers who level those false charges. In her mind, this makes the Jews bullies.

Moreover, implicit in her reply is the accusation that it is Israel alone that is responsible for the "severe situation in Gaza and the West Bank." Neither the Palestinian leaders, the Palestinian terrorists, the countries that fund and supply those terrorists, nor – perish the thought – the Palestinian people themselves bear any responsibility whatsoever for that situation in Gaza and the West Bank.

Robinson is part of a self-appointed international group of diplomats and dignitaries that calls itself The Elders. Along with fellow Elders, Bishop Desmond Tutu and former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, both of whom have also gone considerably out of their way to demonize the Jewish state, she will soon be on a fact-finding mission to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza.

We can well anticipate the protocols these Elders will adopt in finding the facts that they seek. Robinson will undoubtedly wear – metaphorically – the presidential medal to great effect. It will serve as her armour, deflecting the volleys from the bullying Jews who will once again attempt to defend the Jewish state from the sting and stain of her malign judgments. – MBD

INVESTING IN PEACE

More than 100 Palestinian and Israeli children came together last week for a soccer camp in the Shfeya youth village near the northern Israeli town of Zichron Ya'akov, aimed at fostering mutual understanding, building lasting friendships and creating a new generation of youth advocates for peace, in a fun setting. The children, aged 10 to 12, came from underprivileged communities in Israel and the Palestinian Authority. In its second year, the camp was run jointly by the Sports Department of the Peres Center for Peace and the Al-Quds Association of Democracy and Dialogue. It is funded by Ireland's Department of Foreign Affairs, through its Irish Aid program.

Petersiel takes on new role at Leo Baeck

Heading largest Reform Jewish elementary school in North America

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Eric Petersiel says his philosophy as a school administrator has to change with his new role at Leo Baeck Day School.

The new head of school, who served as principal of Leo Baeck's south campus at Holy Blossom Temple for eight years until this summer, said in an interview that in his previous role, he tried to be everywhere at once, to the best of his ability, for parents, children and teachers who needed him.

Now, he said, his job heading the largest Reform Jewish elementary school in North America – with a total of almost 900 students divided between two campuses – is "to ensure that the day-to-day operation is safely in someone else's hands and that the future of the school is in my hands."

At the same time, he said, he doesn't want to lose contact with students.

"I've always loved playing my guitar and singing for them," he said. Petersiel believes that music "adds to the potential for deep spirituality."

He has also enjoyed dressing up as "a pun" on Purim. Most recently, he wore a cardboard box (with a straw), covered with names of famous Jews. "Eventually a student figured out that I was a 'Jews' box,'" he said. "It may not have been my best."

The 38-year-old educator succeeded the school's interim director, Denny Grubbs, on July 1.

Grubbs led the school through a transition year following the resignation of David Prashker in March 2008, amid a controversy over sexually explicit and violent poetry he had posted online, and Grubbs worked closely with Petersiel for the past six months. Jonathan Harris, former principal of Fieldstone Day School, succeeds Petersiel as principal of the south branch.

Petersiel, an alumnus of University of Toronto Schools and Temple Har Zion's supplementary school, once considered a career in the rabbinate, but realized his main area of interest was "to teach people how to make Judaism an important part of their lives." He felt that becoming a Jewish educator would provide more direct contact to do that.

His background includes a BA from McGill University in Jewish studies and philosophy, and a B.Ed and a master's degree in biblical Hebrew language and literature from the University of Toronto. As well, he is certified by the Reform movement as a Reform Jewish educator (RJE).

Petersiel started his career as a Jewish educator in supplementary schools at Holy Blossom and Oakville's Shaarei Beth-El Congregation, and has also been on the faculty of Camp George for more than a decade as a volunteer professional educator.

He believes Jewish camping, in conjunction with day school education and synagogue participation, are "the three key factors that combine to create a positive and knowledgeable Jewish identity. I think they work hand in hand beautifully. It's important to be involved in all three."

Eric Petersiel

He said that Jewish supplementary school also "has a very strong possibility of success" in achieving the same goal, when combined with the other two factors.

However, he noted, "for many families, it feels compartmentalized, because school occurs in the day, and Jewish school occurs outside of that."

In contrast, he said, day school education is "seamless."

Petersiel's new role coincides with what he termed "a very exciting year" for Leo Baeck.

Not only is it the school's 36th year of existence, but it's the 18th year for its Thornhill campus, he noted.

As well, the Union for Reform Judaism's biennial convention will be held in Toronto in November. It will mark the first time in 30 years that it's being held in Canada.

"We intend for the biennial to serve as our big celebration point," said Petersiel, who plans to divide his time between the school's two campuses.

As well, he said, the biennial provides "an opportunity to explore the significance of day school education to liberal Jews, which by and large has been considered an anomaly."

He said Leo Baeck is planning its own professional development day immediately after the biennial.

This past June, the school launched its own siddur, aimed at students in grades 5 to 8. Petersiel, who was the driving force behind its creation, said that steps are being taken toward developing a version for younger students, with a target launch date of Pesach 2011.

Also, the school will apply this year for accreditation as an International Baccalaureate school. "That will require celebration as well," Petersiel said. "Hopefully, it will occur in the spring. What a perfect way to cap off our 36th year."

Jews seeing the forest for the trees

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

For outdoor enthusiasts of all stripes, summer is a time to catch up on activities such as hiking, canoeing, rock climbing and cycling.

But for the members of Mosaic Outdoor Clubs of America (MOCA), the continent's largest non-profit, Jewish outdoor club – there are 25 regional clubs across the United States and Canada, plus a chapter in Israel – it's also a time to sit, kibbitz and perhaps find one's bashert while adventuring through the woods.

Celebrating 21 years as a niche club for Jewish outdoorsy types, MOCA has helped cement thousands of friendships over back-country camping trips, kayaking excursions and all manner of foresty camaraderie.

Brenlee Robinson

For Torontonian Brenlee Robinson, MOCA's new president – and a leader of the 150-member strong Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario, Canada's only chapter – the group plays a vital role in North America's Jewish community.

"It's true. People can end up meeting their bashert on the Mosaic trips," she said, smiling. "I can think of six couples who've gotten married over the last two years alone."

Robinson said it's the "diversity of activities" offered by the club that often attracts members, many of whom are stuck in urban lifestyles, but wish to act on their country impulses while maintaining a Jewish vibe.

MOCA's website advertises "hiking, biking, camping, canoeing, rock climbing, backpacking, skiing, sailing, kayaking, scuba diving, snorkeling, skating, volleyball, horseback riding, and more" for members to pursue.

Though not a strictly religious organization, Robinson said all MOCA (and Mosaic Ontario) clubs strive to bring some aspect of Jewish culture and observance to their trips.

"These [rituals] often change depending on who's leading a trip. But we'll have Saturday evening havdalahs on overnights."

That said, the clubs exist more as "socially Jewish" forums than anything else, Robinson said.

The organization also hosts an annual international event for members. This year, it's a Sept. 4 to 7 weekend retreat in Simi Valley, Calif.

Robinson expects hundreds of members from across the continent to partake in the "California Dreamin'" program, which will feature hikes, nature walks, and "a variety of in-camp activities such as swimming, tennis, volleyball, and softball. Nightly programming will include mixers, Israeli dancing… [and] Shabbat under the stars," according to the club's event website.

Although MOCA is still relatively small as an organization, Robinson said one of her goals as president is to secure corporate sponsorship to enable better programming and foster more interest in the group's mandate.

"A lot of members in our clubs don't have connections to the greater Jewish community. This is their chance to be among Jewish friends," she said. "For me, Mosaic is a huge part of my [Jewish] social network."

Robinson's appointment to the presidency of MOCA is especially significant, as she's the first Canadian to hold the position in the organization's history.

It's a point she takes pride in and intends to leverage for the benefit of the Canadian Jewish community, she said.

The last international event in Ontario took place in Haliburton in 2002. Robinson said she hopes to bring the event back to Canada soon.

"When the event was in Ontario… it had the highest attendance ever: 220 participants. There was a real draw to see Canada. We had a fabulous time, and it stimulated a period of real growth and development for the local club," she wrote in a post-interview e-mail.

One major hurdle still remains for the organization – attracting members under 40 years of age.

Robinson, who's in her late 40s, admits that for the most part, member demographics tend to skew toward the 40-plus set, for whatever reason.

People in their 20s and 30s "are generally reluctant to join when they see an older population at the events," she said. "The question 'How do we bring in younger people?' has been asked a lot."

One idea floating among the MOCA executive is for local chapters to partner with their regions' major Jewish organizations to attract interest.

"It's waiting to happen," Robinson said. "For Jewish continuity, it would make sense for local organizations to fund Mosaic clubs. I think there's great potential for mutually beneficial partnerships."

Celebration is in order

Recently, The CJN reported on the Second Canada-China-Israel Roundtable on Agri-Innovation, held in Ottawa at the end of July. The trilateral meeting, which followed upon an earlier November meeting in Yangling, China, will advance research into agricultural technology.

As reported in The CJN, there will now be a call for proposals from companies, research institutes and universities in the three countries for collaborative industrial R&D projects focusing on the application of high technology to the sustainable development of agriculture and agri-foods.

By any yardstick of measurement, this trilateral agreement has vast implications for the future of the world's agricultural capabilities. Not surprisingly, however, the announcement of the agreement passed under the radar of the major media outlets. As we know, the major media outlets tend to regard Israel as a source primarily of one kind of story: David and Goliath-like conflict with the Palestinians and the Arab world. And they depict Israel, falsely, as Goliath.

But this is only part of Israel's story. In truth, it is only a small part of Israel's story. Increasingly, the real story about the Jewish state, some six decades after its founding, is not the extent of the power of its citizens' army; but rather, the extent of the power of the creative and scientific thinking of its people.

Israeli advancements are at the cutting edge and are changing the face of every scientific, medical, humanitarian and artistic field. But most Canadians, indeed alas, most Jews do not know this, since most of the news they read or see or hear about Israel virtually ignores it.

Henri Rothschild, president and CEO of International Science and Technology Partnerships Canada told The CJN that Israel is a proven international leader in a number of advanced technologies including nanotechnology, software development and medical research. Israel's scientific leadership in nanotechnology, Rothschild suggested, can be instrumental, for example, in finding ways to purify and re-use water.

That was but one instance, Rothschild noted, where the multidisciplinary approaches combining Canada, Israel and China could possibly lead to breakthrough achievements of benefit to the entirety of world humanity. "The novel model of R&D collaboration established today will harness the power of multidisciplinary and multilateral science and technology partnerships to enable the sustainable use of marginal lands, improve the quality of harvested foods and help to free the world from hunger," Rothschild enthused.

Imagine. Tiny Israel with 6-1/2 million people joining, if not actually leading, intellectual, scientific and humanitarian forces with Canada of 35 million and China of 1 billion people. This tells a truth far more in line with the reality of the Jewish state than the frequent, often distorted, stories of conflict with its neighbours.

Israel's enemies and their supporters would have us commiserate over the existence of the Jewish state.

In contrast to their malign wishes, however, celebration is in order.

Church's divestment of Israel resolution

As a member of the provincial legislature of Ontario, I express deepest concern and outright opposition to the United Church of Canada's proposed resolution calling for the "Divestment of Israel," titled "Seeking peace in the Middle East using South African actions for justice as a model" ("United Church weighs anti-Israel measures," Aug. 6). This resolution is not only one-sided against Israel, but also counterproductive and insulting to the Middle East's only democracy, Israel, especially when the resolution places the State of Israel in a South African "apartheid" context.

I have the greatest respect for free debate and discussion, but this one-sided resolution adds nothing to the building of understanding and compassion. At best, this is a misguided attempt by a vocal minority within the United Church of Canada to pursue a very partisan agenda.

Hopefully, this resolution will be rejected, and the United Church and its members –who have a legacy of humanitarian outreach and compassion – will move away from this confrontational approach and stop attacking a most vulnerable and fragile democracy: Israel and its people.

Need left-wing views in CJN

One way The CJN could help the new president of Canadian Jewish Congress to reach out to the left would be to devote one op-ed column in every edition to a view from the left on Israel and/or the Jewish community ("New CJC head aims to mend relations with left," July 30). A second way would be to have as an editorial policy to not allow the words "self-hating Jew" or "naive" and "deluded" to be used in articles and letters to the editor, except as a direct quotation from a source. The third would be to recognize that the left represents a broad spectrum of opinion, so that when some far-left group decides upon an action, the whole left is not branded as supporters of it. The Jewish community needs its active left to be in the pages of The CJN, for when there is no voice of loyal opposition, the tendency is to move further and further to the right.

Jewish law and cremation

In her letter to the editor, Eileen Shapero states her case for the Jewish law of no cremation ("Cremation and Jewish law," Aug. 6). While no one can argue that it is a Jewish law, her argument is that one could be responsible for undue suffering "on the other side" if cremated.

My father was cremated in 1980, and my mother was cremated in 1996. My father, who died in Florida, did not want to be buried above ground, as is the practice there. Nor did he want his body shipped back to the grave site he had purchased in Montreal 30 year prior, as his children no longer lived in Montreal. My mother had her own reasons. I can assure Ms. Shapero that no evil has come to pass as a result and that the memory of my dear parents as good, kind, honest, generous people is still intact and will be until the last person who knew them has died.

Fatah congress raises questions

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

The fiery rhetoric at last week's Fatah meeting in Bethlehem has renewed concerns that the Obama administration is not doing enough to pressure the Palestinians.

At the first Fatah general assembly in 20 years, participants refused to renounce violence and passed confrontational resolutions, including one blaming Israel for Yasser Arafat's death.

Even as Jewish organizational leaders condemned the assembly, many of them acknowledged that Fatah leaders would remain Israel's chief Palestinian interlocutors for peace talks. But they urged U.S. President Barack Obama's administration to issue a condemnation of the harsh talk at the West Bank meeting.

"We would like to see this administration express some disappointment on some of the rhetoric coming out" of the conference, said Anti-Defamation League national director Abraham Foxman. "It's not in line with the American initiative to bring the parties closer together."

But other Middle East observers, including some who have supported the Obama administration's calls for an Israeli settlement freeze, cautioned against such an approach. While some of the language used at the Fatah gathering may have been troubling, they said, the White House might be better off if it stayed focused on the broader picture and not necessarily respond to specific rhetoric.

Thus far, the Obama administration has said nothing, with the State Department passing up a chance to make a statement. State Department spokesperson Robert Wood was asked at Monday's media briefing about the party platform Fatah adopted at the assembly, including the position that the group "maintains the right of resistance by all means possible."

"I haven't seen the plan," Wood said, and simply reiterated "the importance of both parties [implementing] the 'road map' [peace plan] obligations, not taking any steps that in any way prejudge the outcome of future negotiations."

Some are viewing the administration's lack of response to the conference rhetoric as another example of what some Jewish leaders have charged is an imbalance in the pressure being applied on Israel compared to that being put on the Palestinians and Arab states.

Obama has told Jewish leaders that pressure is being placed as well on the Palestinians and Arab governments, and suggested that perceptions of an imbalance are largely created by the media. But while the administration has made repeated public demands on Israel for a settlement freeze, it has said little publicly about the necessary steps that the other side must take, though Obama has issued general calls on Palestinians to stop incitement.

Several Middle East observers said they had read only media accounts of the Fatah party platform and not seen the full document. According to the reports, the platform reportedly reiterates "the Palestinian people's right to resistance to occupation in all its forms in line with international law." Fatah leaders asserted in statements that they reserved the right to "armed struggle."

In his speech to the conference, however, newly re-elected Fatah chair and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas did stress that the Palestinians would focus on "non-violent" resistance.

Some Israeli officials and officials at U.S. Jewish groups also criticized what they viewed as unreasonable demands made by Fatah at the assembly, such as proclaiming it would not negotiate with Israel until the Palestinians were given all of Jerusalem. Others downplayed such positions, saying both sides usually posture by making maximalist demands before a negotiation begins.

Another complaint: Some who have engaged in violence and terrorism were honoured and spoke at the conference.

Israeli government officials have been weighing in on the congress. Before the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said, "The rhetoric coming from Fatah and the positions being expressed are grave and unacceptable to us." The next day, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman told a group of visiting Democratic U.S. Congress members that the Fatah platform, along with unrest in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, "has buried any chance of coming to an agreement with the Palestinians in the next few years."

The American Jewish Committee called the assembly "a slap in the face" to those interested in peace. Jason Isaacson, the group's director of government and international affairs, specifically pointed to the resolution charging Israel with the death of Arafat as "a signal of the lack of seriousness" of Fatah.

"How is that acceptable in a political movement trying to operate on the world stage?" he asked, also criticizing the "wink and nod about the return to armed struggle.

"We naturally hope the administration would view the conference "with the same sense of concern that we have expressed in our statements, unless the bar of expectations is set so low that a disappointing conference isn't worth commenting on," he said.

One Middle East insider who declined to be identified was more blunt about the administration's need to respond. "This silence is what creates the impression of the imbalance," the insider said. "Where is the condemnation for this kind of behaviour?"

"This rhetoric impacts the street," said Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "We've learned you can't dismiss the issue of incitement."

But other observers suggested that the administration should be more cautious about condemnation.

Nathan Brown, a political science and international affairs professor at George Washington University and an expert in Palestinian reform, had not seen the full Fatah platform. Still, he said, it should be viewed as akin to a U.S. political party platform that might contain some "red meat language" to satisfy the political factions in a "large and diverse movement" like Fatah, but isn't necessarily followed by the party leaders.

Brown said what was more important was whether the Fatah leaders elected at the assembly would form a "coherent" organization dedicated to a diplomatic solution and whether they continue to "do what the Israelis want them to be doing" on security and other issues, something that won't be known for a few months.

Americans for Peace Now spokesperson Ori Nir, whose organization has been supportive of Obama's approach, said that while some of the "hyperbole" from the Fatah congress was "troubling," he didn't think "micromanagement" of inflammatory statements by Palestinians or Israelis would be helpful to peace efforts. Nir also put a positive spin on the excerpts of the party platform he had read, noting that while they were still holding out violence as an option, the platform "adheres to the peace option."

Whatever the interpretation of the Fatah assembly may be, there is general consensus that Fatah is still the only game in town when it comes to a peace partner for Israel – which is why the group's actions should be taken seriously.

Not everyone agrees with that assessment, though.

"This conference made it crystal clear," Zionist Organization of America president Morton Klein said, that "peace is not possible with Hamas or Fatah."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) expressed shock at the "startling silence on the part of Americans by way of response" to the Fatah conference, committee chair Moshe Ronen told The CJN last week.

"We certainly watched the Fatah conference carefully, as did Israelis and, one would have thought, the Americans. We come out of it really concerned. At a minimum [the lack of U.S. response] erodes confidence entirely. It's always been trust and confidence that has driven Israelis to take risks and make the kind of concessions that they have," Ronen said.

He likened the conference and emerging circumstances to those that occurred at the Khartoum conference after the 1967 Six Day War, where Arab leaders rejected a comprehensive peace with Israel and instead authored the "three noes" resolution: no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with Israel.

The Fatah conference – and the resounding non-response from the Obama administration – "isn't helpful in providing the Israeli on the street with any sense of reassurance that the Americans truly 'get it.' [Americans] now have a pattern that has emerged in terms of rejection from the Palestinians, rejection from the Saudis… It's like Khartoum all over again," Ronen said.

Despite this, he holds out hope that Canada will play an influential role with its southern neighbour.

Ronen said he hopes "the strength of the emerging relationship between Canada and the United States will be used as a platform to perhaps sensitize the American administration in a way that parochial or identified pro-Israel agencies like CIC or its American equivalents are not able to do."

Asked if the committee had heard any such talk from Canadian parliamentarians, Ronen answered:

"There have been expressions from MPs that there are a number of multilateral forums that are upcoming. And Canada will be using them to reinforce certain fundamental messages about Canadian perspectives on the region and where the international community, particularly the Americans, have to be directing their focus. We are somewhat heartened by this reassurance."

CNN and Jackson's death: a real tragedy

The death of a 50-year-old father is always a tragedy. And Michael Jackson's death was tragic. His unfortunate overdose deprived three small children of a father, a family of a son and brother, and fans of a superstar they loved.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But the tragedy of Michael Jackson's death was no excuse for the media coverage that ensued. CNN adopted an "all-Michael" format, following this story with a thoroughness that rivalled coverage of 9/11. CNN and its media colleagues inflated the death of one celebrity into a blockbuster news story.

This is a tragedy as well. Instead of informing people about what is essential and significant, the news media are far more interested in "infotainment." Stories about Uyghur unrest and the Iranian election were ignored in favour of yet another learned analysis on the life of a popular singer.

A general lack of interest in hard news augurs poorly for contemporary society. Ignorance is not a comic flaw. It has an enormous impact on personal growth. The rabbis of the Mishnah tell us that a boorish person cannot achieve piety. Narrow horizons produce people who are spiritually stunted. Without a true thirst for knowledge, a society will deteriorate, entranced with cheap bread and charming circuses.

Even more troubling is an obsession with celebrity. Celebrities are trendsetters. Young girls dress in the style of their favourite pop divas, while their parents dream of a flashy Hollywood lifestyle. For many, celebrities are role models.

Who our role models are matters a great deal. Role models represent our highest aspirations. You can tell a person's character by whom their heroes are.

Heroes aren't what they used to be. The people who risk their lives for the general good – old-fashioned heroes such as firemen, soldiers and policemen, now live anonymous and humble lives. Today's hero wears sunglasses, drives a Ferrari and talks by cellphone with his agent.

Celebrities, our new heroes, are poor role models. Many are often "in and out" – in and out of rehab, in and out of marriage, in and out of court. However, their sins are quickly dismissed by pliant doctors, judges and therapists, all in time for them to return to their adoring fans. Honest redemption and sacrifice are for the movies. In real life, celebrity fame and fortune is all that matters.

A society follows its role models. If our heroes are shallow and superficial, it won't be long before the rest of are wearing designer shades and searching for a new car, a new look and a new spouse.

U.S. Jews should speak truth to Obama

Diplomatic relations, like human relations, involve both symbols and substance. One of the disturbing phenomena we are witnessing in President Barack Obama's White House is that, when it comes to Israel, Obama is fumbling on the symbolic level while pressuring Israel substantively. That's why the White House decision to award Mary Robinson the Presidential Medal of Freedom is so disturbing. It sends a symbolic message of disrespect to Israel and to Jewish sensibilities – at a time when relations with Israel are already tense.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Granting Mary Robinson America's highest civilian honour is a surprisingly unnecessary, self-inflicted wound. A former president of Ireland and former United Nations High Commissioner of Human Rights, Robinson's reputation is forever stained by her failures of leadership during the Durban debacle of 2001, when a UN conference against racism degenerated into an anti-Semitic hate-fest. She also has been very critical of Israel, and at crucial moments during her UN tenure from 1997 to 2002, she failed to pressure the Palestinians to swear off terrorism. It would have taken about 10 seconds of Googling to discover that Robinson is controversial.

As of this writing, no one has come forward to admit nominating Robinson, and the White House spokesperson made some mealy-mouthed comment about not agreeing with everything she's ever said. Dr. Tevi Troy – yes, he is my brother – the former U.S. deputy secretary of health and human services and a former White House aide, reports that a White House source claimed that the Obama people were unaware of the controversy, which suggests rank, amateurish incompetence rather than gross insensitivity.

This unfortunate choice nevertheless highlights that there are powerful forces within the Obama White House and State Department who see Robinson and swoon – rather than remember Durban and feel queasy. This symbolic slap to the Jewish community, coming on the heels of Obama's Cairo speech, which suggested that the founding of Israel stemmed from the Holocaust, makes his picking fights with Israel seem meanspirited.

It's important not to overreact. Obama has spoken eloquently before about the Jews' right to a homeland, about the power of returning to one's roots, and about the need for Palestinians and the Arab world to accept Israel's existence. But Obama has bought into the Peace Now miscalculation that Israeli leaders need to be bullied to compromise rather than calmed and coaxed. So far, many American Jews have seemed reluctant to criticize the president, dazzled by Obama's eloquence, committed to his liberal agenda, silenced by his pro-choice leanings and bamboozled by his clever strategy, which manipulatively balanced off Jewish fears about his Cairo speech with a trip to Buchenwald. This trade-off showed an understanding of American Jews' unhealthy obsession with the Holocaust and growing distance from Israel's needs.

With a pro-Israel prime minister, Stephen Harper, at the helm today, many Canadian Jews may be tempted to judge American Jewish silence arrogantly. But during the bad old days of former prime minister Jean Chrétien, Canadian Jews were the Jews of silence. During the difficult years of Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's wave of terror against Israel and the Jewish people, many Canadian Jews were too loyal to the Liberal Party, and too fearful of Chrétien's wrath, to criticize.

Moreover, in 2004, when I criticized McGill University for giving Robinson an honorary doctorate, most of the organized Jewish community was silent. One leader told me, "I'm sorry you said anything. You're a nice guy, and I don't want to see you get bashed publicly." I told him then that I had nothing to apologize for, that it was Robinson who needed to apologize for her failures to stop the worst outbreak of official anti-Semitism in decades.

On both sides of the border, Canadian and American Jews must remember that we're free to criticize our leaders and free to praise them, and that we're most effective by avoiding overly simplistic demonization or deification. Democracies are dynamic, and governance is complex. As citizens in a democracy, it's our right and our privilege to speak truth to power, asking our leaders to do the right thing, both symbolically and substantively.

From the leaver to the leavee

Leaving is never easy. Perhaps you remember the first time someone broke up with you, or fired you, or moved away from you. Wasn't it easier when you were the one doing the rejecting rather than when you were the one being rejected?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

When we change, the change is internal only to us. The rest of the world is the recipient of the change, but they aren't transformed as we are. The one who changes does all the work. The one who stays behind is the one left with the questions. They are the "changee," as it were, and that isn't easy.

This phenomenon is well known in the religious community. When a person converts, or changes their religious observances and worldview; when someone joins a new community of friends and peers, or when someone creates a new self-definition, it's natural for those they leave "in their wake" to feel rejected, denied, or even offended. What was wrong with the way you were before? (Read: what's wrong with me and the way I live now?)

It's very important for the "changer" to be extra sensitive to those feelings – to not dismiss them or deny them, but to understand them and respect them. To remain true to the new convictions while respecting that not everyone shares them, or wishes to share them, or desires to change their present convictions, is a delicate balancing act.

I write this in the midst of our own family's changing, in being the "leavers" from Toronto for a whole year. Our friends wanted to know what was wrong with Jewish life in Toronto that we had to leave. Why couldn't I take a year off and just relax here at home? Why drag our kids out of the country to a new school, to new friends (or maybe not new friends at all), a foreign language, a small apartment and a new life when they were perfectly comfortable right here?

We got the same reaction last year when we moved downtown. What was wrong with the old neighbourhood? Was our leaving an indication that the 'burbs weren't "the place to be"? Why shlep up to work, why downsize all that stuff, why meet new neighbours when the old place was perfectly fine?

In the weeks ahead, we'll start thinking about the High Holidays and tshuvah – the ability to change and start anew. We'll hear (hopefully) inspiring messages from the many worship places we frequent that will exhort us to change. But most of us will not make any major changes. We won't alter the way we live, or eat, or drive, or parent, or observe Jewishly. We will be the leavee as others around us stay put.

But sometimes an internal shift needs to be radicalized in order to be fully lived. We think we can change if we just do it slowly, a little here and a little there, so no feathers are ruffled, no status quo overturned. Anthony Robbins asks, "Why do people persist in a dissatisfying relationship, unwilling either to work toward solutions or end it and move on? It's because they know changing will lead to the unknown, and most people believe that the unknown will be much more painful than what they're already experiencing."

Not me. I love the unknown. I embrace it. It's what Miriam and Moses faced in the desert. It's faith that keeps the change from being terrifying.

And so, to the "leavees" from the "leavers": In the words of Benjamin Franklin, "When you're finished changing, you're finished." Toronto, you ain't finished yet. I look forward to seeing you when I get back. Happy changing!

The Kirshner File

Letter from Lublin

Roman Litman, 76, is a rarity. In a city of 350,000 inhabitants, he is one of Lublin's last remaining Jews. By his count, Lublin, formerly an important Jewish centre in eastern Poland, has only 50 Jews left. "There may be more," he said. "But we don't know."

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

Decimated during the Holocaust, Lublin's Jewish community has experienced such a precipitous decline that there has not been a Jewish wedding here in decades. The last bar mitzvah took place in the 1980s.

As if to underscore the state of this community since World War II, Litman told me that not a single Jew living here today was even born in Lublin, the seat of Poland's first independent government in 1918 and the cradle of the Solidarity trade union movement in the 1980s.

Litman's claim was disputed by Robert Kuwalek, a local historian, who said he knows an old Jewish Lublin-born woman who still lives here, but who, like some Jews in this country, conceals her true identity. Litman, married to a Catholic, like almost all his fellow Jews in Lublin, hails from the neighbouring town of Lenczczna and has lived here since 1945.

Poland's ninth largest city, and its biggest one east of the Vistula River, Lublin has fared badly in history, having been sacked by waves of invaders from the Tatars to the Lithuanians. Jews arrived in Lublin in the early 12th century, King Casmir III having granted them permission to settle on its outskirts. By the 16th century, the Jewish population was concentrated in the Podzamcze district, in the heart of today's quaint old town and in the shadow of the Royal Castle, a major tourist attraction.

During the mid-1600s, Jewish residents obtained land for a cemetery, and today Lublin boasts of having the oldest Jewish tombstones in Poland. Although the Nazis pillaged the cemetery, they left some gravestones untouched. A hub of Jewish scholarship, Lublin was a centre of Chassidism. Centuries ago, Lublin hosted the Council of the Four Lands, the central body of Jewish authority in Poland from 1580 to 1764.

As elsewhere in Europe, Jews could never be certain what the future would bring. Lublin was attacked by Cossacks and Moscovite armies in 1655 and they proceeded to torch the Jewish quarter. In 1795, when Poland was partitioned for the third time in 23 years, Jews were expelled. Yet by the mid-18th century, Jews comprised half of its population and Lublin had the largest Jewish community after Krakow and Lwow. Jews played a pivotal role in the economy and were particularly active in the tanning and cigarette industries.

By the 1920s, 37,000 Jews resided in Lublin, forming one-third of its population. The Jewish community was supported by 12 synagogues, an array of private prayer houses, a hospital, an orphanage, three cemeteries, a network of schools and the Chachmei yeshiva, one of the most famous in Poland. Inspired by Lublin's renown, novelist Isaac Bashevis Singer wrote The Magician of Lublin.

The German army marched into Lublin on Sept. 18, 1939, 17 days after its invasion of Poland. Within weeks, Jews were subjected to a series of restrictions, penalties and physical attacks. The Royal Castle was converted into a Gestapo prison through which 40,000 people would pass.

A street scene in Lublin today. One-third of its population was Jewish before the Holocaust. [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Lublin would serve as the headquarters for Operation Reinhard, the German plan to eradicate the 3.3 million Jews of Poland. In the autumn of 1941, the Nazis had the Majdanek concentration camp, a few kilometres from Lublin's old town, up and running.

In 1940, shortly before the Germans established the ghetto, Roman Litman and his family – parents and siblings – fled to the Russian zone in Poland and then on to Siberia and central Asia.

Deportations from Lublin commenced in March 1942. The ghetto's Jewish inhabitants were sent to the Belzec extermination camp, while still others were dispatched to Majdanek. Jews who survived the roundups were murdered in Majdanek in November 1943. Several hundred Jews who had worked in the Royal Castle and had avoided death were shot in the summer of 1944. According to Kuwalek, a number of Jewish children were saved by Christians.

Roman Litman

Lublin was captured by the Red Army on July 24, 1944, the first city in German-occupied Poland to be liberated from Nazi tyranny. Until Warsaw's liberation in January 1945, Lublin was Poland's temporary capital and the seat of the Soviet-backed Communist provisional government.

After the war, the Litmans went back to Poland. They lived in Lwow, which was claimed by the Soviet Union and by newly independent Ukraine after the Soviet Union's breakup in 1991.

When Litman returned to Lublin, the city had anywhere from 3,000 to 5,000 Jews, but its Jewish infrastructure had been virtually destroyed. "There was a Jewish school and only one synagogue," said Litman, one of Lublin's last Yiddish speakers.

With the 1946 pogrom in Kielce, many Jews who had settled in Lublin left Poland altogether. Among them were Litman's brother and sister, who immigrated to Israel in 1946 and 1950 respectively, and Litman's second brother, who immigrated to Denmark in 1960. He and his sister, now 67, stayed in Poland to look after their parents, who died in 1968 and 1993. He seriously considered emigration right after the war, but since his parents had no inclination to move and he wanted to continue his education, he remained in Poland.

Litman and his wife have had three children, and they, in turn, have sired six grandchildren. All of them live in Lublin.

Never a member of the Communist party, he earned a steady income as an engineer building bridges. Even the state-sanctioned anti-Semitic campaign in 1968 had no effect on him.

I interviewed Litman at the Chachmei yeshiva at 85 Lubartowska St.

Founded by Rabbi Meir Shapiro in 1930, it had 200 students in its formative years. During the Nazi era, the yeshiva was converted into a police billet and a military hospital. The Nazis confiscated the books in its library, scattering them to the winds.

Under communism, the yeshiva housed the medical faculty of a university. The property was returned to the Jewish community in 2004 under Poland's 1997 restitution law. The yeshiva, having since been been renovated, is now an educational and cultural centre with a synagogue (the prewar shul was transformed into a museum on Lublin's Jews), lecture halls, a library and a dining room equipped with a kitchen.

The yeshiva and the former shul notwithstanding, precious little remains of prewar Jewish Lublin.

The old Jewish quarter starts at Grodzka gate, a romantic-looking arched passageway that once separated Jews and Christians in Lublin. Picturesque and redolent of Roman Vishniac's photographs of pre-1939 Poland, this neighbourhood of rough cobblestone streets brims with Renaissance-style buildings and cafés, as well as a Jewish-style restaurant, the Mandragora, whose specialties run the gamut from gefilte fish to Israeli salad. There are a few plaques commemorating buildings in which Jews lived.

Lublin's Jewish past is lovingly nurtured by Tomasz Pietrasiewicz, the 50-year-old Polish Catholic director of the Grodzka Gate Theatre. By means of various projects, including an oral history study, he and his colleagues promote Lublin's former status as a bright beacon in the Diaspora. "I grew up in Lublin, near Majdanek, but I was not aware of Jews or Jewish culture. It was very typical." For the past number of years, however, he has dedicated himself to setting things right.

Concordia to host meet on anti-Israel campus activities

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concordia University will be the venue for a day-long international conference Aug. 23 on what organizers see as a growing trend on North American campuses to undermine the Jewish state's right to exist.

The event, called Israel on Campus: Defending our Universities, is being presented by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), an independent pro-Israel advocacy and research group headed by Concordia professor Frederick Krantz.

Frederick Krantz

The public event will be held at the downtown campus, but because of security concerns, the exact site is not being made public beforehand. For the same reason, only advance registration is being accepted.

Krantz said CIJR had no trouble booking space at Concordia, which has had a history of anti-Israel activity, although it has been relatively calm in the past few years.

The conference isn't being sponsored by the university, but Concordia president Judith Woodsworth will make the opening remarks.

The lineup of speakers includes Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre, who will give the keynote address; and Edward Beck, director of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, an American non-governmental organization that organized an online petition after the British University and College Union put forward a resolution to boycott Israel, signed by thousands of non-Jewish academics who said they would not participate in any event that excluded their Israeli counterparts.

Also on the agenda are Alvin Rosenfeld, director of the Institute of Jewish Culture and the Arts and author of Imagining Hitler, who wrote a controversial essay in 2006 in which he contended that extreme left-wing Jewish critics of Israel are aiding the state's enemies and contributing to a new wave of anti-Semitism.

The lineup also features two leading scholars on anti-Semitism: Robert Wistrich of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Charles Small, a Montreal native who launched Yale University's Initiative for the Interdisciplinary Study of Anti-Semitism three years ago.

Among the other speakers are Aviva Raz-Shechter of the Israeli foreign affairs ministry and Manfred Gerstenfeld of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

In a rare collaboration with CIJR, Montreal's Federation CJA is contributing materially to the conference. Other sponsors include the Middle East Forum, a conservative American think tank founded and directed by historian Daniel Pipes, who also started Campus Watch to monitor professors believed to be disseminating misinformation about the Arab-Israeli conflict, as well as the private and Canadian Asper, Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman, and Dym Family foundations.

The New York-born Krantz, who has taught at Concordia for 40 years and founded CIJR 21 years ago, believes pro-Arab activism at North American colleges has entered an ominous phase in which the Israeli government is not only criticized for its policies, but the country's very legitimacy is being attacked and the need for action is urgent.

Accusing Israel of practising apartheid, an increasingly acceptable charge, amounts to rejecting the belief that the Jewish state has a place within the family of nations, he said, and that is, effectively, anti-Semitic.

This anti-Israel expression is coming not only from pro-Palestinian and left-wing student groups, but increasing from members of the faculty, Krantz said.

He said he frequently hears from pro-Israel students at Concordia and McGill University who say they feel they're prevented from speaking up for Israel or feel intimidated from doing so.

"They are either being shot down when they try to speak at [student-organized] events or, increasingly, in the classroom," he said.

"Certain professors are making their anti-Israel views known, and I'm hearing more often from students who say their teachers are not letting them speak or they are restraining themselves from saying anything for fear it will affect their grades."

Training students who are sympathetic to Israel in how to respond is a major aspect of CIJR's work.

Robert Wistrich

Krantz sees the "growing anti-Semitism masquerading as anti-Zionism and anti-Israelism" on campus as not only a concern to the Jewish community, but a threat to democracy and free thinking.

"Defending democratic Israel on campus is crucial not only to supporting Jewish students and reaching out to non-Jewish students, but also to preserving the crucial western, and indeed human, values of academic freedom and critical inquiry," he said.

Among the goals of the conference are to develop strategies to counter Israel's detractors, including founding a North America-wide "Campus Defence Council" made up of students, faculty and administrators to co-ordinate a campaign to "take back the campus."

The conference will be followed in the evening by a fundraising gala dinner for CIJR at the Gelber Centre, where Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler will be guest speaker. There will also be a performance by violinist Dame Ida Haendel in memory of the late Clara Balinsky, a founding member of the CIJR's board of directors. The honoree is Krantz. Tickets for that event start at $1,000 per couple.

For information on the conference or dinner, call 486-5544 or visit www.isranet.org/conference2009.

At 85, Hillel mission remains vital

By JONATHAN SARNA
JTA

Eighty-five years ago, in May of 1924, two wealthy and accomplished Jewish college students, Nathan F. Leopold and Richard A. Loeb, motivated by Nietzchean philosophy and determined to commit the "perfect crime," brutally murdered 14-year-old Bobby Franks in Chicago.

Shocked B'nai Brith leaders in Mobile, Ala., wrote to the national secretary of B'nai Brith, Leon Lewis, expressing interest in the case and wondering what the Jewish organization's response would be. The answer, in one word, was "Hillel."

The new campus organization, whose establishment Lewis characterized as "almost providential," would henceforward provide Jewish students with precisely the kind of initiation into Jewish communal life that Leopold and Loeb never had. Wisely, B'nai Brith adopted Hillel in 1925 and sponsored the organization for nearly 70 years.

Hillel, which continues its 85th anniversary year celebrations this summer, began independently in 1923 at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana, and focused from the start on winning over assimilated Jewish college students.

"The average student is sick and tired of hearing about the glorious past of our people," a Hillel executive reported in 1928. "He wants to have definite advice as to sex morality, about Jewish home life, his attitude toward his girl, etc. Unless we can give him that conception, make him understand that any sort of Jew is accepted, that we do not classify the Jews as Orthodox or Reform, then we have failed."

Under the direction of Abram Sachar, later the founding president of Brandeis University, Hillel expanded, growing to more than 100 units at universities across North America. Many of these, significantly, opened during the dark days of the Depression when (as now) higher education seemed to many Jews a more sensible alternative to unemployment. Since Jews faced significant social discrimination on college campuses in those days, Hillel provided them with a refuge, a home away from home. It strove to meet their social, cultural and religious needs.

Following World War II, thanks in part to the G.I. Bill, the number of Jews on college campuses mushroomed. The American Jewish community's interest in campus affairs, meanwhile, waned. As B'nai Brith support for Hillel diminished, Hillel professionals – fatefully – concentrated their attention on the minority of involved Jewish students. For the rest, Hillel became irrelevant.

Underfunded and passive, Hillel was ill prepared to weather the cultural and political storm of the 1960s.

"In an age when students protest against the establishment, Hillel is the symbol of the establishment," Rabbi Edward Feld, then Hillel director at the University of Illinois, complained.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg characterized the American college campus as a "disaster area for Judaism, Jewish loyalty and Jewish identity."

By the 1970s, Hillel was admitting defeat.

"We are doing our job poorly in some places," its national director, Alfred Jospe, confessed. "We continue to have utterly inadequate and sometimes virtually non-existent program budgets.

Jospe went on to note that with "a staff-student ratio of one to 2,000 or one to 3,000 or even one to 5,000," Hillel is "cruelly underfunded."

The 1988 appointment of Richard Joel as international director began Hillel's modern-day revival. During the course of his tenure, Joel remade, re-energized and repackaged the organization. Exploiting communal concerns over Jewish continuity, he reminded Jewish leaders that "the campus is... a key gateway for Jewish continuity and a key definer of the Jewish future."

Under his leadership, Hillel became an independent organization, reached more students than ever and raised unprecedented sums.

Today, guided by President Wayne Firestone, Hillel has adopted a new mission statement and strategic plan that commits the organization to "enriching the lives of Jewish undergraduate and graduate students so that they may enrich the Jewish people and the world."

Through Taglit-Birthright Israel trips, social justice "alternative" breaks and on-campus educational initiatives, Hillel

Anti-Israel group files rights complaint against Carleton

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario has accepted a complaint by an anti-Israel student group against Carleton University for the school's decision to remove an Israeli Apartheid Week poster from its campus.

Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) at Carleton filed the complaint because of the university's decision in February to remove 100 of the group's posters depicting a helicopter labelled "Israel" firing a missile at a teddy bear-holding toddler labelled "Gaza."

The University of Ottawa followed suit a few days later and banned the same version of the poster, which was advertising Israeli Apartheid Week, a week-long series of anti-Israel lectures that originated at the University of Toronto in 2005 and has since spread to more than 20 cities worldwide.

A Carleton spokesperson said that the posters were removed from campus because SAIA didn't get them approved, and because they included the use of an image that was "inflammatory and capable of inciting confrontation" and "could incite infringements of the Ontario Human Rights Code."

In the days after the decision to remove the posters, Carleton's provost and vice-president academic, Feridun Hamdullahpur, sent a letter to the entire university community calling the posters "hurtful and discriminatory" and saying that Carleton "will not tolerate actions that infringe or contravene the Ontario Human Rights Code and Carleton's own University Human Rights Policy and Procedures."

Hamdullahpur added that if anyone is found to be in violation of the school's policies, they will be subject to sanctions, and that "students can be withdrawn from their studies indefinitely."

Although both Carleton and U of O removed the posters, IAW events weren't cancelled and SAIA was asked to submit a different poster for approval.

But SAIA, represented by human rights lawyer Yavar Hameed, claimed in a statement released on Aug. 6 that the group and its members "have been differentially treated and discriminated against by the Carleton University administration because of their association with, and support of, Palestinians."

The group also claims that SAIA members, allies and "Palestinian students, have been threatened and intimidated by the Carleton University administration in its failed attempt to thwart Israeli Apartheid Week."

"SAIA will not back down," SAIA member Ben Saifer said in the statement.

"The days of administrative intimidation and sophism are counted at Carleton University, and the tides are turning in North America against the supporters of the illegal Israeli occupation and apartheid regime."

In a statement released the following day, B'nai Brith Canada condemned SAIA for "abusing Canada's human rights tribunals and commissions with another frivolous complaint."

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, said that the purpose is to "create a legal chill.

"This new strategy is being propagated by those groups that cross the line from legitimate criticism of a democratic Israel to promoting propaganda against the Jewish state and, by extension, the Jewish people," Dimant said.

In its own statement, Carleton said that the claims being made by SAIA are "false and completely unfounded. The issue is now being addressed by the human rights tribunal and will provide us with a formal opportunity to respond point by point to these false claims once and for all. In the meantime, we're not going to do anything to undermine that process."

The case is now scheduled for mediation, which is set for Sept. 1.

Hillel has returned to its roots strives to infuse Jewish meaning into the lives of the most uninvolved Jewish students. Hillel has returned to its roots as an organization committed to those lacking a Jewish education while still providing outlets for more Jewishly committed students.

Hillel celebrates its anniversary at a moment when the largest group of Jewish students in American history – the children of the baby boomers – is reaching college campuses. Meanwhile, the Jewish community's funding sources, drained by the economic downturn and the Madoff scandal, are dramatically shrinking. As communities everywhere reassess their priorities, the needs of Jewish college students need to be remembered.

Eighty-five years after the Leopold and Loeb case brought the needs of Jewish college students to the community's attention, Hillel's mission is more urgent than ever.

PLEASE HELP ME!!!

Have you ever wondered, "What is it like to be poor?" "What is it like to be destitute?" "What is it like to beg for food and shelter?" "What is it like to have NO WEALTH?" "What is it like to lack the basic resources of life?" "How does it feel to be impoverished, destitute, frayed, worn out, rundown, tattered, threadbare, strapped, poverty stricken, penniless, broke, busted, worthless, wretched, inferior?"

The Torah speaks explicitly about Jewish charity: "If there be among you a needy person ... within any of thy gates in the land which the Eternal Your G-d has given you, you shall not make your heart obstinate nor close your hand from your needy brother."

There are over 30,000 Jews in the GTA who are living below the poverty line. We ask that you give TZEDAKAH (charity) at this special time of year to help these poor families.

Can Britain's chief rabbi sell in America?

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Most of what you need to know about Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of Great Britain, is apparent from the story he tells of how his latest book, The Home We Build Together, came to be.

It begins in the prime minister's study at 10 Downing St., where Rabbi Sacks would go "regularly" to study the Bible with former British prime minister Tony Blair.

During one of their meetings, Blair – who Rabbi Sacks describes as a "very religious man" who reads the Bible daily – asked why only 34 verses are needed to describe the creation of the world, but more than 10 times as many to account for the building of the mishkan, the tabernacle the Israelites built in the desert after the Exodus.

Caught off guard, Rabbi Sacks offered an answer he considered insufficient. Only later, when Britain and other western European democracies found themselves enduring spasms of social tension brought on by the alienation of young Muslim immigrants, did he arrive at a more thorough understanding.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks

The problem Europeans were facing, Rabbi Sacks says now, is precisely the problem the Jews faced in the desert: how to unite a diverse people into a nation.

"God does the most unexpected thing of all," Rabbi Sacks explained in a recent lecture in New York. "He says to Moses in effect, 'You want to turn a fractious group of individuals into a nation, a responsible nation, that coheres? Get them to build something together. Get them to build a house for me.' "

In a manner that is fast becoming his signature, Rabbi Sacks took that biblical insight and used it to fashion a book-length assessment of the failure of British multiculturalism. One of the book's chapters, titled "Face-to-Face and Side-by-Side," went on to became the title of a British government report aimed at promoting better relations between the country's religious communities.

"The government had enormous problems thinking the problem through," Rabbi Sacks told JTA in a recent interview. "I realized that I had solved a problem that they were struggling with."

Rabbi Sacks occupies a peculiar perch in the rabbinic universe. He is a religious figure who has the ear of the most powerful leaders of a largely secular country. Though his flock comprises the 300,000 Jews of the United Kingdom, he's best known for commenting on wider social and cultural issues. And in an era when chief rabbis are often viewed as either inglorious or irrelevant – or both, in the case of the scandal-plagued rabbinate in Israel – Sacks has managed to retain a far-ranging influence through his prolific writings and frequent appearances on television and radio.

"Dr. Sacks is one of the handful of religious figures in Britain today who is as well known outside his own faith community as within it," the Independent newspaper wrote in a profile.

"Among non-Jews, he is a figure of some considerable stature, a staunch defender of the interests of his own people, but one whose stance makes a significant contribution to society's debate on the big social issues of the day."

Rabbi Sacks has been in the news lately for his work on the new Koren siddur, the first new bilingual (English/Hebrew) siddur for use in Orthodox congregations in a generation. Its publisher hopes the siddur will become the predominant prayer text in modern Orthodox congregations in North America.

Rabbi Sacks is assiduous in staying above the "political" or partisan fray. At the New York lecture, for example, he artfully dodged a question about Pope Benedict XVI's recent speech at Yad Vashem, which was lambasted publicly by former Israeli chief rabbi Yisrael Lau. Sacks made do with platitudes about Jewish-Catholic reconciliation.

Asked what he thought about female rabbis, Rabbi Sacks launched into a flowery riff about the importance of women in Jewish life.

"The word rabbi means 'my teacher.' And can women be teachers of Torah? Absolutely," he said. "And beyond that, you will have worked out by now that I have no intention of answering questions that I don't want to answer."

The questions that most exercise Rabbi Sacks these days have little to do with parochial Jewish concerns – another noteworthy departure from his Israeli colleagues, who are most often in the news for controversies related to the coercive power they wield in a mostly secular country. His second decade in office was inaugurated in 2001 with a call to Jewish responsibility, as opposed to the more inward-focused idea of Jewish renewal, which was the theme of his first.

Rabbi Sacks believes that Jews, as a people with a long history of living as a minority, have much to teach contemporary societies struggling to integrate recent arrivals. But he warns that a model of dialogue between faith leaders – what he calls the "classic model" of interfaith understanding – is unequal to the task.

Dialogue is "an elite activity," Rabbi Sacks says, and the problems are "down there on the street." Moreover, with Muslims, dialogue will always get bogged down in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"It's not the major route forward, and we should not have high expectations," Rabbi Sacks said. "There are some wonderful, wonderful moderate Muslims in Britain and in America and in the Middle East and elsewhere, and I love them and we work with them, and we have them in our home, and we do things together. But that is not the actual route to a solution of the problem. It is a misconception of the problem."

Asked about American rabbis who have made such encounters a mainstay of their interfaith efforts, Rabbi Sacks again has nothing but words of praise.

"That is one avenue," Sacks said, flashing his penchant for metaphor. "Avenues are very beautiful. It's a lovely winding lane full of wild flowers and lovely vistas. But it's not the interstate."

Sderot kids visit Camp Kadimah

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

BARSS CORNER, Nova Scotia — "I felt it would be the best summer of my life – and it was."

Yonatan Daniel, 15, of Sderot, Israel, smiled warmly as he related stories of six weeks at Camp Kadimah, near Barss Corner, N.S., 100 kilometres southwest of Halifax.

"The people I met made it special. The staff made me feel at home. Everything. It was so great," he said, beaming.

Daniel was one of 10 children from Sderot, ages 13 to 16, attending the 65-year-old summer camp. It gave them a chance to escape being in the midst of confrontation.

Amalya Rachamkin, 16, from Mishmar Hayarden, was in the counsellor-in-training program. "In six weeks, we became like relatives. We listened and talked to each other so that the Canadians realized we have a regular life like they do."

She said she and her Israeli friends might do army service while the Canadians "have fun and chill out, but we watch the same TV shows and listen to the same music. Even though we do army duty, we still have a normal life."

She smiled. "Israel is my favourite place, but Kadimah is certainly second."

It was the first overseas trip for the Sderot-area children, plus six others from northern Israel. Saar Ben Zeev, 16, of Kibbutz Shamil remarked on the "cold" temperatures that sometimes dropped into the low teens [Celsius] at night. "Israel is usually in the high 30s and 40s in the summer."

Rachamkin said she'd make a deal with Canada. "We'll give you sun. You give us rain" – and there was plenty of the latter at Kadimah throughout the summer.

Daniel said he was shocked by the cool temperature of the water in Kadimah's Lake William. "It took time to adjust, because swimming in lakes at home is like a bath in comparison."

The CITs went white-water rafting, rock climbing and to Moncton, N.B., as part of their development program. "[The Jewish community of] Moncton made us feel important and special, even thought they didn't know us," Rachamkin said.

Though homesick for a day or so, Ben Zeev said she'd tell any youngster from Israel that Kadimah is a great experience. "I would tell them, 'Don't waste time missing home,'" she said. "I've made many friends and will keep in touch by e-mail and Facebook."

Despite a summer-long threat of swine flu and some kids living in quarantine, as well as almost all campers taking Tamiflu for several days, Rachamkin said none of the Israeli kids were hit by the illness. "Our counsellor got it, and they thought all CITs should be quarantined, but after a few hours, they let us out.

"We're kosher – no swine," she laughed.

Opened in 1944 for Jewish youngsters from Atlantic Canada, Camp Kadimah now attracts more than 75 per cent of its campers from Ontario and another 15 per cent from other locations in North America as the Atlantic region's Jewish population diminishes.

For the last 10 years, Kadimah has hosted four children from Israel's north. Two summers ago, two children from Sderot came to camp. Funding for the 10 Sderot children in 2009 came mostly from the Atlantic Jewish community, with UIA Federations Canada's Israeli branch and the Jewish Agency co-ordinating camper recruitment.

Michael Pink, Halifax, co-chair of the Camp Kadimah committee, said that "Kadimah is all about forging relationships between children from Atlantic Canada, Ontario, plus those from Israel."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

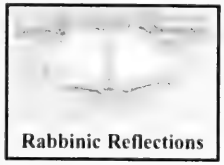
Waking up in Elul

By RABBI CORY WEISS

If, like me, you're not a morning person, you probably know this routine. The alarm goes off – too early, as usual – and you hit the snooze button. Ahh, another nine minutes of sleep. Then another nine, and another. Once, in university, I set my alarm for 7:30, and "snooze alarmed" – sleeping nine minutes at a time – until 12:06. (You can do the math!) That's my record, anyway.



Finally we crawl out of bed, but we're still not quite awake. We need to shower, brush teeth and have some coffee or tea before we're ready to take on the day.

Now we're prepared. (But if we skip any of the necessary steps, we might be ogres until noon.)

So it is with the High Holidays approaching. Coming to Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur services unprepared is like jumping out of bed at 5:30 a.m. without having had a "snooze." To do the soul-searching and self-reflection that accompanies the Days of Awe, we need time to prepare ourselves.

Thousands of years ago, our rabbis understood this. That's why they suggested we use the month of Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah, to get ready. During Elul, the shofar is blown each morning at the end of Shacharit services – it's literally a wake-up call telling us it's time to get our minds, hearts, and souls ready for the High Holidays. Slichot is the worship service held on the Saturday night just before Rosh Hashanah and is the culmination of this important month of preparation. This year, we observe Slichot on Sept. 12.

Elul is a gift of time. It's a time to consider which people in our lives we need to reach out to and make tshuvah, repentance, during Aseret Yemei Tshuvah, the Ten Days of Repentance. It's a time to reconnect and reconcile with family and friends from whom we have distanced ourselves. It's a time to search our souls and start our cheshbon nefesh, our individual accounting of the person we are today and the person we hope to be in the days and years to come.

In their book Preparing Your Heart for the High Holy Days, rabbis Kerry Olitzky and Rachel Sabath write: "The period of Elul-Tishrei (the 40 days leading up to Yom Kippur) is designed to help us let go of the pain in our past so we can embrace the future with hope. We think back over where we have been in the past 12 months, how we got to this place in our lives, and where we had hoped to be. We may not be willing to admit it readily, but we yearn to experience a renewal of spirit. It's one of the many reasons we wait in such anxious anticipation for the High Holy Days throughout the summer."

Rabbi Andrea Weiss (a classmate, not a relative) teaches that the month of Elul serves as an extraordinary transitional moment, reflecting the traditional image of bein hashmashot, literally "between the suns." She suggests that Elul is "a bridge between summer and fall, between long sunny days and crisp afternoons full of colour and wind... between who we are and what we want to be; between regret and repentance, guilt and renewal; between the frustration of accepted patterns and the promise to change."

As the time draws near that we will come together to refresh our spirits and renew our faith during the High Holidays, we could all use some preparation. Rather than continually hitting the snooze alarm, let us arise during Elul and exercise our souls, stretching them and warming them up for the sacred moments we will share together in Tishrei.

Rabbi Cory Weiss is the rabbi of Temple Har Zion in Thornhill.

Elul reflections

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Elul is here, and as always, it's the Hebrew month that ushers in the beginnings of the preparations for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur – the High Holidays.

Many people are familiar with the traditional ways of preparing. The first strategy is often attending minyan groups and devoting ourselves to more heartfelt prayer. But for some of us, trying to experience heartfelt prayer at all can be itself a tremendous challenge, so it's hardly a useful tool for those people. Another traditional method of preparation is the giving of charity, but, again, in today's economy, many people have had to reduce their philanthropic donations rather than increase them.

So perhaps this year, the traditional means of High Holiday preparations need to be expanded with a longer list.

Certainly, honest self-reflection has always been important at this time of year, but it's equally important to define what that would entail. Specific actions and choices that were made should come to mind. Specific relationships and encounters should be re-analyzed in terms of our own contributions to them.

Most of the year, we easily default to recognizing how everything that's wrong is the other person's fault, but during Elul we should continuously ask ourselves what part we played. Were we reactive or proactive? Were we reflective or impulsive? Did we behave with acts of lovingkindness toward others, or were we more "Canadian", at that moment and react with mere tolerance?

This kind of soul-searching and inner reflection is not something that any of us would invite into our daily lives easily. Too much soul-searching can lead to too much reflection and not enough action – something that Judaism frowns upon. Therefore, just as Shabbat is the weekly time for spiritual reflection, the month of Elul is the annual time for deeper and broader reflection. And this level of soul-searching is not something we do for ourselves, but rather for someone we love.

Generally, unless a particular incident troubles us, we have no reason to re-evaluate ourselves, contending that if it isn't broken, let's not fix it. If an event troubles us, we will reflect on the event, not on our entire beings. If someone we truly love speaks to us of our potential being wasted, or that we could and should be happier, or that they are troubled by our choices and wish us to improve ourselves, only then will we delve as deeply as we can.

We are motivated by love to please and grow with this person. A parent, a spouse, a child – these are the relationships that touch us deeply. For these people, we will search ourselves and grow in ways that may even surprise us.

The month of Elul consists of the Hebrew letters that spell the phrase "ani ledodi vedodi li," – meaning, "I am for my beloved, and my beloved is for me." It's the beautiful statement made in the Song of Songs from one lover to another. It's symbolic of the utterance of love our souls make toward God and the love we expect in return.

Nothing short of that deep a love could motivate us to search as deeply as we need to search.

So much work, only one month.

Israel Antiquities Authority arrives

By ALEX GROPPER

The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) is responsible for all of the antiquities in Israel. It is the arm of the Israeli government responsible for preserving and enhancing our knowledge of the phenomenal archeological heritage of Israel.

Past Forward

Originally the IAA was known as the Department of Antiquities. It is headquartered in the Rockefeller Museum in east Jerusalem. Among the treasures housed there are the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The IAA is responsible for the care and upkeep of the scrolls, most of which are housed in the Rockefeller Museum. While looking at some of the pictures of the work that had been done on the scrolls in the early days by the original group of scholars that had been assembled by Pere Roland de Vaux, one is struck by the primitive conditions under which they laboured.

The scrolls were kept under glass and fully exposed to the sunlight streaming in through the windows. Some of the scrolls were joined together with Scotch Tape. Pictures of the scholars showed them smoking in close proximity to the documents.

These things would appear as a desecration to the current generation of scholars working on this precious material. Today, the Israel Antiquities Authority is using state-of-the-art techniques in preserving the scrolls. They are sealed off and protected in their own environment. No documents are allowed to be away from Jerusalem for more than a short period. Therefore, two sets of scrolls are part of the Toronto exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum, which ends on Jan. 3, 2010. By allowing the scrolls away for a short time only, the authority ensures that they will continue to be preserved with all of the available resources that science and research has put at the disposal of the conservators.

The curator of the scrolls, Hava Katz, and the chief conservator came to Toronto a few times to inspect the ROM and to see that its facilities met their meticulous standards.

The visiting curator for the scrolls exhibit, Risa Levitt Kohn, originally from Toronto, but now head of Jewish studies at San Diego State University, had already gained important experience working with the scrolls when she was the curator of the successful scrolls exhibit that was recently held in San Diego.

One of the reasons that these priceless documents came to Toronto was to highlight the fact that a charitable organization called the Israel Antiquities Authority-Friends in Canada has been set up with the purpose of making Canadians aware of the crucial work that the IAA is doing to preserve, explore, study and enhance Israel's archeological heritage. It is a heritage that does not just belong to Israel, but is of paramount importance for all of mankind.

To that end, the IAA is looking to start a number of projects in partnership with various Canadian groups and institutions. Obvious possibilities include the involvement of Canadian schools and universities on excavations in Israel. A natural choice would be the participation of schools such as the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto on Israeli digs as part of its curriculum. The ROM has already prepared an educational program that would integrate the Dead Sea Scrolls into the existing Ontario curriculum.

Another option that has been discussed is pairing synagogues, churches and mosques with their ancient counterparts in Israel for the purposes of excavation and restoration. The IAA Friends in Canada is also looking to set up archeological libraries in various communities across Canada to make people aware of Israel's archeological heritage and its importance for all groups, regardless of their backgrounds.

The scrolls, while the tip of the iceberg when it comes to Israel's priceless treasures, are an important legacy for all Canadians. It is hoped that the ROM's exhibit will make people want to get more involved from the Past Forward.

Back to school resources

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The days are still long. The nights are warm. And even though most kids may not want to admit it, school is just a few weeks away. As teachers begin to dust off their lesson plans, now is a great time for them to take a look at the marvellous Jewish educational resources that the Internet has to offer.

BabagaNewz.com not only has a great name, it looks good, too. Geared toward Jewish middle school students and their teachers, the site presents a lovely blend of educational resources tucked into a fun package. The teachers' blog is updated regularly with timely and imaginative material such as step-by-step instructions for folding an origami shofar. What makes this special is that the shofar exercise comes along with a lesson plan that provides meaning behind the craft: "Each fold symbolizes the many small changes we make through the tshuvah process in which we transform ourselves into better people." [tinyurl.com/ teach01]

Another website that impressed me was Chinuch.org. This remarkable resource allows you to download lesson plans, worksheets, illustrations and maps that can be copied and distributed to classrooms. You can download PowerPoint presentations about Israel, clip art, archival excerpts from Olomeinu magazine and much more – all for free! Anyone can browse the site but you will have to register in order to download material. The site strongly encourages members to contribute copyright-free materials to the database. [tinyurl.com/teach08]

Since the holidays are just around the corner, that means teachers will soon be hunting for pictures of apples with honey and sukkahs to decorate their classrooms. There are many good sites that provide free clip art that you can print and colour, such as the Jewish Clipart Database. [tinyurl.com/ teach13]

Stay on that same page for some educational – and fun – activities including the Jewish Trivia Quiz, the Multilingual Word Search Game, the Israel Geography Game and more.

If you are looking for photographs of Israel to liven up your classroom walls (or practically anything else), don't forget about Flickr.com. The photo-sharing megasite has pictures about just about any subject imaginable – including Judaica and Israel. All you have to do is plug a keyword into the site's search engine. And for the copyright conscious teacher, many high-quality photos can be downloaded and even reprinted for free provided proper credit is given.

DataJEM, the Database of Jewish Educational Materials, allows you to search for resources by topic (anti-Semitism, communities, culture, etc), setting (classroom, youth group, story hour) and language (English, Hebrew, French, Spanish, Yiddish, etc.). For example, I did a search for Holocaust-related material appropriate for 16- to 18-year-olds in English. The site returned more than 250 resources, including information about relevant books, plays, films, television documentaries and museums. [tinyurl.com/teach10]

JESNA, the Jewish Education Service of North America, provides pedagogical information according to theme (curricular resources, Jewish identity, salaries and benefits, etc.), as well as links to other relevant sites. Downloadable reports when I visited included Schools That Work: What We Can Learn From Good Jewish Supplementary Schools and The Jewish Community Guide to Understanding Teens. [tinyurl.com/teach11]

The Lookstein Center for Jewish Education in the Diaspora also presents both lesson plans, a huge library of information (including Reflections on Teaching Midrash Aggadah in Elementary Day Schools, Prayer as an Act of Chesed). As well, there's a database including contact information for Jewish schools in North America, the United Kingdom, South Africa and Australia. [tinyurl.com/ teach06] The Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education, presents ideas for creating a challenging and meaningful curriculum. [tinyurl.com/teach05]

Before closing, I just had to pay a return visit to to BabagaNewz and its Totally Unreasonable Jewish Quiz. One question consists of the number "613." Can you choose the right answer?

a) Dinnertime b) Ottawa area code c) Mitzvot

To see the answer, visit that Unreasonable Quiz. [tinyurl.com/teach07]

Israeli-Palestinian peace as elusive as ever, Cotler says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler's recent annual fact-finding trip to the Middle East produced little to be hopeful about, he said at a recent media briefing upon his return.

In fact, contrary to some opinions - including those of former British prime minister Tony Blair, U.S. President Barack Obama, and diplomats at the United Nations – that there's "no end is in sight" to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Cotler concluded.

Peace, he said, is as elusive as ever.

During his sojourn in the Middle East, Cotler met with Palestinian Authority (PA) Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, Foreign Minister Riyad al-Maliki and Fatah Tanzim leader Kadura Phares.

He also witnessed the goings-on at the Fatah assembly in Bethlehem, the first in two decades.

Cotler came away with the view that "profound divisions" remain vis-à-vis the conflict, specifically on five issues: borders, the two-state solution, Palestinian refugees, Jerusalem and settlements.

"So on five major issues, there is no consensus," Cotler said.

Right now, he said, there is no Palestinian leadership that can purport to "speak on behalf of the Palestinian people" because Hamas, which is in control in Gaza, continues to refuse to recognize Israel.

At the Fatah convention in Bethlehem, the evidence of deep divisions among the Palestinians themselves was there to be seen, Cotler said.

Besides the PA and Hamas fighting to be seen as the leaders of the Palestinian people, he said, the PA is "strongly divided within itself" in the form of a "generational" conflict in which younger Palestinians don't necessarily trust older ones.

"This all played out at the Fatah convention," Cotler said, and was confirmed in his meeting with Phares.

Interestingly, he noted, neither Fayyad nor al-Maliki actually attended the Fatah conference, since they're not members of Fatah.

The decisions at the assembly also underscored the hard line that Palestinian militants are continuing to take on the conflict. They included no recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, a full return to pre-1967 borders, a non-negotiable right of return for Palestinian refugees, dismantling (not only freezing) settlements and, to Cotler's surprise, a call for both east and west Jerusalem to fall under Palestinian sovereignty.

Israel, according to the assembly, Cotler related, was even to blame for former PA president Yasser Arafat's death.

"So not only is peace impossible right now, even a process toward peace is," Cotler said.

Both Fayyad and al-Maliki, he noted, rejected many of the decisions taken at the assembly.

Irwin Cotler

In light of all this, Cotler said Ottawa could play a role by urging reform of the Palestinian justice system and by establishing a "tripartisan" committee comprising Canadians, Israelis and Palestinians to reduce the level of "incitement" toward Israel.

Canada can and should be more "engagé," he said.

In answer to a question by The CJN, Cotler said PA President Mahmoud Abbas does not appear prepared to confront Hamas, although he must.

While visiting the West Bank, Cotler noticed that conditions have improved greatly, with security and governance making the lives of the people there much better.

"People are in the cafés. It is more cosmopolitan," he said, noting that Palestinian elections are due to take place next January and that Fayyad hoped word would get out to Gaza that life there under Fatah could be better than it is now under Hamas.

"I shared his optimism about the West Bank," Cotler said, "but I don't think the people in Gaza know about what's going on there."

Cotler also presented a list of "10 ways to contain Iran," many of which are already in the private member's bill he tabled in June, the Iran Accountability Act, and others that aren't, such as denying landing rights to the Iranian transportation industry and better enforcement of embargoes on technology and arms.

AP sees Fatah through rose-coloured glasses

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It's hard to imagine two news reports appearing the same day, about the same subject – in this case the Fatah congress which concluded last week in Bethlehem – that are more opposite in their accounts.

On the one hand, there is Mohammed Daraghmeh's Associated Press story, carried in the Aug. 12 Globe and Mail under the headline "New Fatah leaders boost peace efforts," and, on the other, there's Khaled Abu Toameh's report for the Jerusalem Post under the polar-opposite heading, "New faces of an unreformed, hard-line Fatah."

Daraghmeh wrote that "the vote appeared to present a new Fatah leadership that removed some of the old-time exiled revolutionaries who urged armed struggle in favour of pragmatic, younger grassroots activists who grew up in the West Bank and Gaza and support negotiating a peace treaty with Israel... Their ascendancy gives a boost to [U.S. President Barack] Obama's hoped-for Mideast breakthrough."

Mohammed Dahlan

Daraghmeh did note that while these "younger leaders endorse creation of a Palestinian state next to Israel, they do not offer far-reaching concessions." Still, the implication was that the concessions they're prepared to make are sufficient to move the peace process forward toward a two-state solution. And in a line that, uncharacteristically for AP, appears to editorialize, he wrote that Israel, like Hamas, poses "formidable obstacles" to peace.

Writing from a contrary perspective, Abu Toameh had the following to say: "Many of the newly elected members of Fatah's central committee may be younger than their ousted predecessors, but that does not necessarily mean that they are more reform-minded or less corrupt. Nor does the election of the young guard representatives signal a shift toward moderation."

On the crucial subject of the "concessions" that this new leadership is willing or able to make, Abu Toameh said forget it – there are none: "It's unrealistic to expect changes in Fatah's policies now that younger leaders are sitting in the central committee. Even if [Marwan] Barghouti, [Mohammed] Dahlan and [Jibril] Rajoub wanted to adopt a more moderate approach in peace talks with Israel, they would face fierce opposition from the Fatah General Assembly. The assembly has actually tied the hands of the Fatah leadership by setting a series of 'red lines' that no Palestinian – not even Mahmoud Abbas – is entitled to cross. Fatah has said quite loudly and clearly that it's either 100 per cent or nothing."

Foremost among these is the insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinians to Israel – a prescription for the end of Israel as a Jewish state.

Does someone such as Dahlan even want to adopt a more moderate position if he could? It seems not. Just a few months ago, he was quoted countering Hamas' charge that Fatah had already recognized Israel's right to exist: "They say that Fatah has asked them [Hamas] to recognize Israel's right to exist, and this is a big deception. For the 1,000th time, I want to reaffirm that we are not asking Hamas to recognize Israel's right to exist. Rather we are asking Hamas not to do so, because Fatah never recognized Israel's right to exist."

Is this, as some western analysts have suggested, "just rhetoric" meant to appease the Palestinian street as a way of drawing support away from Hamas?

Veteran Jerusalem-based Mideast analyst Jim Lederman says firmly "No."

In conversation about the vastly different ways the Fatah congress was reported, Lederman noted that "there is simply no evidence that Fatah has moved to a more moderate position. If anything, their negotiating position has only hardened as Abbas and others have made more and more demands, such as insisting that there can be no talks with Israel until all settlement activity stops – something Abbas did not insist upon during his talks with Ehud Olmert under the Annapolis peace plan."

Montreal YM-YWHA to open on Shabbat

Federation CJA says it will respect decision

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The YM-YWHA should have consulted the Jewish community at large before deciding to open on Shabbat, given the strong views held on the issue, but Federation CJA will respect the decision, federation president Marc Gold says.

On Aug. 10, the Y's boards of directors and trustees passed a resolution to open the Snowdon branch's fitness facilities at 1 p.m. on Saturdays as of Oct. 31.

The mid-summer decision came out of the blue, in stark contrast to 2002-2003, when the Y undertook a nine-month review of its Shabbat policy led by an ad hoc committee. The process included polling its membership and an invitation to the entire community to submit its opinions.

Although the Y never made public the actual results, the voices of opposition were overwhelming and came from a broad spectrum of Montreal Jews, including a formal rejection by Canadian Jewish Congress.

The Y shelved the issue.

Although the Y is a constituent agency of the federation, Gold said, "it is an independent organization, with an independent board, with the exclusive responsibility of setting its own policies, and we respect its autonomy."

Marc Gold

The federation's yearly allocation to the Y represents about nine per cent of the Y's annual budget, he added, and that money doesn't go to fitness programming.

Gold said Y officials advised the federation "some weeks ago" that it was considering reversing its longstanding practice of closing on the Sabbath.

"We strongly encouraged them to undertake the broadest possible consultation of the community, not just the members. We did not say yea or nay [to the idea of revisiting the issue]," Gold said. "We will not seek to impose our will… We do not have the authority to do so."

Gold said he didn't know whether there is a growing desire in the community for the Shabbat hours, but he thinks the issue remains potentially divisive.

"I hope that even those who oppose this will approach it with a bit of an open mind. If there is a debate, I hope it is in the spirit of good will and understanding," he said.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko of the Orthodox Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron has already spoken out against the Y's move, and one of the Y's board members, Leon Elfassy, said he is against it. He wouldn't comment further, because he said he's respecting a request from the Y that its executive director, Michael Crelinsten, be the sole spokesperson on the issue.

Rabbi Poupko said, "I think this represents a painful breach of communal norms in Montreal."

Opening on Shabbat is clearly a violation of Halachah, he said, and the fact that it's only the fitness facilities that are being made available for the time being is most egregious from the point of view of Jewish law. The exercise equipment in the Y's cardio centre, for example, runs on electricity, he said.

If the Y offered non-physical activities, such as classes and lectures, it might be condoned, he said.

Rabbi Poupko said the argument that the great majority of Jewish community centres in North America today are open at least partially on Shabbat is not persuasive.

The Montreal Jewish community is distinct because of its unity, he said, and that cohesiveness is rooted in a broad-based consensus that communal institutions must respect Jewish tradition.

He called it "insulting" for the Y to remain closed on Shabbat morning to allow attendance at religious services.

"There is no competition between the Y and the synagogues. No one is worried that we are losing people to the Y," he said.

He warned the Y against "sacrificing its principles for the bottom line," and said that if its motive is, at it says, to attract more unaffiliated Jews, especially working people and young families, it can start by increasing its efforts during its current schedule.

"Are they reaching out now, in other ways?" he asked.

According to the announcement issued by the Y the day after the resolution was adopted, the move is in keeping with the 99-year-old institution's mandate to serve "the widest cross-section of the [Jewish] community possible."

The change will affect only the Snowdon branch, named for its major benefactor, Ben Weider, who died last year. The West Island branch, which is located in an area with a large concentration of younger families, won't open Saturdays for now, mainly for "logistical" reasons, Crelinsten said.

The Snowdon facilities that will be open on Saturdays include the two gyms, swimming pool, the cardio centre and the weight-training room.

"In taking this decision, the Y leadership recognizes the diversity of opinion in our community on this issue… There will be no organized programs, no exchange of money, and the registration desk and [the Vaad Ha'ir-supervised] restaurant will remain closed," the press release states.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko

But Crelinsten allowed that "we have no illusions that this is within the strictest halachic observance."

He pointed out that the Y open to a limited extend on Shabbat already. It is home to two synagogues, one Sephardi and the other geared to the Russian community, which hold Shabbat morning and Havdalah services. The Y is exploring offering additional Jewish services on Saturday.

It will continue to provide programs geared to the sensitivities of Orthodox Jews, such as gender-segregated swimming.

Crelinstein noted that as recently as 1969, the Y was open on Saturdays, and the outdoor tennis courts continued to be later than that. Older people recall that the Y was open throughout Shabbat for various cultural and social activities, as well as recreation, in the 1950s and earlier.

The Y has opened after Shabbat in the fall and winter for some years.

Crelinsten said that in his perusal of the 2003 study (he was not working at the Y then) he found that "the opposition [to opening on Shabbat] was not nearly as clear as people seem to think. It was split right down the middle, and the conclusion was that it was too divisive to go ahead."

He said the Y believes that "today there is a recognition that the community has changed and continues to change, and we must reach out to the unaffiliated and young families, to those who are not otherwise engaged with the community. This is one of the federation's core strategic objectives, and the Y is seen as a partner in that effort."

He denied that the decision is motivated by financial concerns. The Y has a current membership of 6,500, and more than 2,000 of those people's fees are subsidized, some up to close to 100 per cent. "At best, opening Saturdays will be revenue neutral," Crelinsten said.

While the new Saturday schedule may encourage more non-Jews to join, he said it is not the Y's intention to reach out beyond the Jewish community.

As for not consulting the community, he said that over the past few months, the Y has "spoken directly or indirectly to a number of rabbis, as well as the federation, and had informal conversations, I would say, in the community corridors, with a large number of people."

According to his research, between 75 to 80 per cent of North American JCCs operate it least partially on Shabbat, the most recent to do so being the centre in Owings Mills, Md., near Baltimore. "There are only two or three that are completely closed."

Oxfam denies boycotting Israeli cosmetics firm

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff reporter

Allegations by a U.S.-based advocacy group that Oxfam International supports its boycott of the Israeli cosmetics company Ahava are untrue, says the head of the anti-poverty group's Canadian branch.

Earlier this month, Oxfam International denied a report that it had cut ties with one of its Hollywood ambassadors because she endorses Ahava, an Israeli firm that operates in the West Bank.

Ahava manufactures its products – derived from minerals in the Dead Sea – in Mitzpe Shalem, a kibbutz near the famed inland body of water.

Reached by e-mail last week, Oxfam Canada's executive director, Robert Fox, told The CJN that he was unaware of any Oxfam policy to boycott Israeli products.

"Oxfam has expressed no view on trade with Israel, just as we have expressed no view on trade from Canada or Brazil or Cameroon, nor to the best of my knowledge has Oxfam ever issued a statement on trade with Ahava Cosmetics, though we are opposed to trade from the occupied Palestinian territories," he wrote.

Asked about statements by the U.S.-based, grassroots advocacy group CodePink, which supports an all-out boycott of Ahava called "Stolen Beauty" and claims that Oxfam supports the boycott, Fox responded: "With respect to CodePink, I have no knowledge of their actions beyond that which I read in the blogosphere and as such cannot comment."

CodePink describes itself as "a women-initiated grassroots peace and social justice movement."

It accuses Ahava of stealing "Palestinian natural resources in the occupied territory of the Palestinian West Bank" and producing its products "in the illegal settlement of Mitzpe Shalem."

It invokes Oxfam's name in much of its press material for its Stolen Beauty campaign, implying that the international charity supports CodePink.

Representatives for Ahava and CodePink could not be reached for comment by The CJN's deadline.

An Aug. 6 story in The New York Post reported that actress Kristin Davis, one of the stars of popular film and TV show Sex and the City, was no longer working as an Oxfam spokesperson because she does ads and is a spokesperson for Ahava cosmetics.

Oxfam spokesperson Matt Grainger said, however, that Davis and Oxfam have not cut ties, but are figuring out how to handle an issue that could become a "distraction" from Oxfam's work. The group, he said, has advocated against settlements in the past.

Davis was Ahava's first international celebrity spokesperson, signing with the company in 2007.

Grainger added that controversial Presidential Medal of Freedom recipient Mary Robinson, the honorary president of Oxfam who some Israel backers say has been an unfair critic of Israel, had nothing to do with the deliberations on the issue of Ahava and Davis.

Tauben part of new team at Koffler Centre

Having immersed herself in Jewish culture in Philadelphia, Tauben decided to attend a Jewish culture conference in New York. At the conference, she recognized Lori Starr, Koffler Centre's executive director, from a magazine article she'd read.

When Tauben introduced herself, she learned that Starr was looking to rebuild a team at the Koffler Centre, a non-profit agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, located at the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre in the new Donald Gales Family Pavilion.

"Maybe a month later, I came here to interview… and the rest is history," she said.

"It would have never occurred to me to do programming for a JCC. But there is something different about what the Koffler is building, creating, shaping. Here, we're really shaping a vision. This is a community that I feel is ready and kind of hungry for the kind of work that we've already started doing and what we're building."

She said that the programming is multidisciplinary and includes dance, theatre, music, fashion and design.

She said that the goal is to reach the younger members of the community from all backgrounds and denominations.

One example of the kinds of exhibits currently running until Aug. 31 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre is called "One History, Many Stories: A Family Album of Israel at 60."

The photography exhibit, by Israeli-born, New York-based photographer Zion Ozeri, portrays the diversity of contemporary Israeli society with photographs of families from Poland, India, Yemen, Argentina, Ethiopia, Bukhara and Russia.

"Through arts and culture, we can find a way to tell really nuanced stories about Israel, and to celebrate that complexity and not be afraid to be challenged about our perception of Israel," Tauben said.

"We believe in supporting Israel as a Jewish state, but one way of showing your support is to really dig deep and understand what is so fascinating about Israel and Israeli culture. If your only goal is to cast a positive light, you're missing all the shades of grey that are being represented through arts and culture."

She said the centre recently held a screening of an Israeli miniseries called A Touch Away, about a Russian immigrant family that has a difficult time adjusting after moving to Bnei Brak, an Orthodox Tel Aviv neighbourhood.

"It's not easy to watch. I mean, it's entertaining, it is a love story, there are some racy scenes," but, she added, there is also a scene where a haredi man beats another man.

"Some people don't want to see those things, so much so, that someone in the audience, who was Israeli, all he could say was, 'That's not Israel.'"

She said she was glad to get a reaction from the screening because it elicited discussions about how to define what the real Israel is.

"This is what I mean about exploring Israel's complexities. It doesn't mean you love Israel any less if you show that Russian immigrants have a hard time when they come to Israel," Tauben said.

She said she hopes that the programming the Koffler Centre produces will appeal to Toronto's eclectic community.

"Maybe I'm a naive optimist, but I think that arts and culture is a meeting place for people of all backgrounds… In Toronto, it just seems hard to get people to go south of where they want to go or north of where they want to go," she said.

But Tauben wants the centre to go beyond that of a local institution.

"Because I'm from Montreal, I'd like to see relationships cultivated with other communities across Canada. I'd like Montreal – especially because it's my hometown – to be aware of what we're doing here… to encourage outlets for Jewish culture and to understand the commitment this community has made to Jewish culture," she said.

"Yeah, we have our struggles in communicating how important arts and culture is compared to the other things that we fund, but at the end of the day, we're building a whole cultural centre, and that is a really significant commitment from the Jewish mainstream community."

'There is still a lot of work to do'

Rev. Gregersen also said the church did not rule out the possibility that the subject and consideration of an Israel boycott might arise once more at the church's next general council in 2012, if resolutions are brought forward again at that time by its members.

In the meantime, the church said it now has "to enter into conversation as to how to move the [Palestinians and Israelis] toward reconciliation, including, but not limited to, economic boycott."

The news of this continued ambiguous stance met with mixed feelings in the Jewish community, with some expressing anger, while others remained optimistic.

In a statement released right after the vote, Canadian Jewish Congress immediate past co-president, Rabbi Reuven Bulka – who gave an impassioned speech at the opening of the council to enunciate the Jewish community's concerns with the boycott proposals – said he was "encouraged" that the church "saw through" the "dangerous and hateful language, and rejected both the background materials and the Israel boycott proposals themselves."

However congress CEO Bernie Farber – also in attendance at the council last week – told The CJN that while he was "pleased" with the outcome, "there was still a lot of work to do" regarding educating some of the church's leadership about the Israeli narrative.

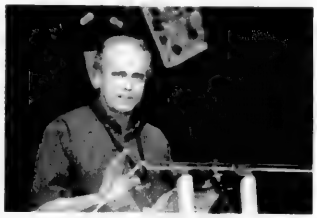
He said the story of the church's boycott proposals on Israel is something his organization has been fighting for the last decade.

Even with the vote ostensibly going Israel's way, Farber acknowledged that there was still a "disconnect" between some of the church's leaders and many of its general council members about how the Israel-Palestinian conflict is viewed.

"When you don't look at both sides of the issue, a demand for a boycott is not a 'justice' issue, it's vengeance," Farber said. "That seems to me to be the general feeling... at the council. So Congress certainly has work to do with the church in terms of getting that point across to its leadership."

He added that "just because the boycott resolution got voted down this time around, does not mean there still isn't much work to do. [United Church of Canada] leadership still has significant problems understanding that there are two players in the [Israel-Palestinian] scenario, not just one. This is a significant bridge to cross. We will be continuing our very strong discussions with the church."

Farber also expressed further relief at the council's ultimate decision on this year's boycott resolution, speculating that had the boycott motion passed, it would have put his organization "in a very difficult position.



Rev. Bruce Gregersen

"There would have been no way we would have been able to involve ourselves in anything to do with the church anymore. It would've done irreparable harm. But it didn't, so this leaves a door open for further discussions and explanations."

Others were not as optimistic.

In a statement last Friday, B'nai Brith Canada called the church's open-ended position with regard to boycott measures an "insult" to the Jewish community.

"It is with great sadness that the Jewish community has learned that the moral stance in defence of the Jewish state expected to come from our Christian brothers and sisters at the United Church's gathering did not materialize," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president.

"It is inconceivable that a Christian organization that should understand God's covenant with the children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and rejoice in the fulfilment of the prophesy of the return of the Jewish People to the ancestral homeland from which they were ethnically cleansed, has chosen instead to join those forces who are determined to undermine the Jewish state."

With great sorrow, the Shinewald and Putter families announce the passing on August 5, 2009 in Winnipeg of

Sharon Tobi Shinewald (nee Putter) ז"ל

Sharon was only 64 years old. She leaves behind her beloved husband of 42 years, Ed Shinewald; her "seven kids," Benjamin Shinewald and Marice Hart, Alix Shinewald and Todd Stevens, Jeremy Shinewald, and Michael Shinewald and Jodi Kovitz; her three wonderful grandchildren Orly, Shai and Lily; her "two mothers", Rochelle Putter and Sophie Shinewald; her siblings Judith Putter, David Putter and Daniel Putter and countless other loving relatives and friends. She was predeceased by her father, Joseph Putter, her father-in-law, Hy Shinewald, and her four beloved grandparents, Sander and Chaya Putter and Levi and Fanny Sommer.

Sharon was born in 1944 in Montreal but her entire life was rooted in Winnipeg and, in the summers, Winnipeg Beach. She taught French and cooking at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (Winnipeg's Jewish High School) for many years to hundreds of students, many of whom still use her recipes. Sharon was very active in the Jewish and broader communities, was a voracious reader and an exceptionally gifted cook. She also traveled the world over and over, including stops in Israel countless times. As well, she spoke English, French, Hebrew and Yiddish. She built a warm, hectic and open home rooted in Jewish values, where eating together no matter what the time, studying hard and discovering new horizons were prized above all. Sharon had a remarkably full and charmed life – she herself said so, even before her diagnosis. Though she packed in more than most people could in 120 years, her life was still much too short. We miss her terribly.

Donations may be made to Cancer Care Manitoba and to the Sharon Shinewald Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

JF&CS social worker 'was totally devoted'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Elinor Gertner, who died last month from renal cell cancer at age 59, will be remembered for her devotion to her family, her profession and the community.

A social worker who worked at Jewish Family & Child for about 35 years, Gertner developed and co-ordinated the agency's Changing Family program in the early 1990s, for families undergoing separation and divorce.

Speaking on the shloshim of Gertner's death, Monica Auerbach, director of JF&CS, York Region, called her a leader in her field. "She developed the program based on the needs of the community and made it relevant to people undergoing either amicable or high-conflict divorces.

"She helped [program participants] navigate the whole process, and she helped children become resilient in order to come through the divorce with a healthy ability to cope."

Elinor Gertner

Auerbach said that Gertner came to work while she was ill, and even while in hospital she would call into the office with instructions. "She was totally devoted."

Eric Gertner, Elinor's husband for almost 35 years, said in his eulogy that she was a "brilliant diamond" with many facets.

He received an e-mail after his wife's death, he said, "that summed up her special qualities. Our friend, Pat Richardson, wrote that she will 'remember Elinor for many things, the friendship and good advice she so willingly gave, her generosity and good spirits, her kindness and willingness to listen, her concern for others less fortunate, her practicality and lack of pretence, and the courage and dignity with which she faced her illness.'"

Gertner called his wife the "consummate professional. Many of her colleagues looked to her for guidance. [She had an] ability to get to the point, to innovate and to improve what are already terrific programs.

"She was never one to rest on her laurels. She was always thinking about how she could improve herself and the services that she and JF&CS provided."

He said she was committed to her work to the end. "She could have had a successful private practice, but she always said she chose to stay at JF&CS because she believed in the agency's model of providing services to those who could not [otherwise] afford them."

Gertner said she took part in a number of charitable activities, and worked with her children at the Daily Bread Food Bank and volunteered to help clean up Sherwood Park. "Recently, she started a letter-writing campaign to convince the government of Ontario to make Torisel, a kidney cancer drug, available to those who cannot pay, even though our own insurance covered the drug.

"She also gave blood about 85 times. When her cancer was detected, she was upset for many reasons, not the least of which was that she could no longer donate."

Gertner said however, that his wife's greatest achievements, "are sitting here in the front row – Lara and Marc. She was always there if they turned to her for help, and sometimes she was there even if they didn't ask for her opinion, but she knew they needed it.

"She said on many occasions that a parent was successful when his or her job became redundant, because his or her children had become independent," he said.

"Lara and Marc's devotion to their mother over the last year is a direct measure of the respect and love that Elinor earned from them."

Lara said that her mother always wanted to help the people around her be their best. "She brought her clients to the best position to parent their children, she reminded her friends to respond to compliments with a simple 'Thank you,' and she helped [her own mother] become as independent as possible."

Barbara Kates, Elinor's twin sister, said that growing up "we always had each other. As we became adults and referred to something that had happened to one of us in childhood, there were many times when we really didn't know which one of us it happened to."

During Elinor's illness, she said, "someone commented that I seemed to have a kind of primal understanding of what [my sister] needed. What a gift [that is] for both of us. I was a twin, I am a twin and I will always be a twin. And as I said goodbye to Elinor, I had a chance to tell her that."

In addition to her husband, children and twin sister, Gertner leaves her mother Beulah and sister Laraine Naft, brothers-in-law David Kates, Neil Naft and Henry Gertner, and sisters-in-law Cheryle Gertner and Marlene Brickman.

Sylvia Lennick performed with Wayne & Shuster

Remembered for the line 'Julie, don't go!'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Those who attended last week's funeral of Sylvia Lennick were treated to a taped performance by the actress and singer, who died Aug. 10 at age 93.

"Theatre was Sylvia's life, and we couldn't stop her from singing. She sang three days ago in the hospital," her oldest son, David, said in his eulogy.

Lennick, along with her husband Ben, who died in 1996, began acting with comedians Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster when their radio show debuted on CBC in 1946. She remained with their troupe throughout the 1960s and '70s, and also appeared on CBC variety shows, as well as on stage in Stratford, Toronto and New York.

She's well known for her performance in the Wayne and Shuster comedy sketch "Rinse the Blood off My Toga," which was first performed on the Ed Sullivan Show in 1958.

As Calpurnia, the bereaved widow of Julius Caesar, she cried, "I told him, 'Julie, don't go!'" in a thick Bronx accent.

She was a regular on the Adventures of Tugboat Annie and Cannonball, and in the early 1970s, she played Mrs. Sherwood, the nagging mother on The Trouble with Tracy.

Later, she and her husband performed in Theatre in the Home, in which they went out to private venues and retirement homes in order to bring theatre to those who couldn't get out.

She continued to perform after her husband's death, and as recently as 2002, she had a part in Disney's Get A Clue starring Lindsay Lohan.

Her second son, Michael, said at the funeral that his mother was the strongest woman he had ever known. "Even when she was small and weak, she was strong. Until the end, she said she wasn't going anywhere. She had songs to sing and a book to write – she was working on her memoirs – and she intended to get back to it.

The late Johnny Wayne with Sylvia Lennick, who died last week.

"This is the first family event [my mother] didn't attend," he said.

David said that his parents never felt the need to move to London, New York or Hollywood. "They made their living here."

In addition to Michael and David, Lennick leaves her daughter, Julie, and her sister, Geri Gans.

Show you care with food

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Recently I've had several opportunities to prepare meals, or parts of meals, for friends and neighbours for any number of reasons, both happy and sad. I also had occasion to be on the recipient end after a hospital stay.

If you are going to bring food to someone, unless you're given specifics of what to make, find out how many people you will be cooking for and if they have any special dietary needs such as food allergies, salt-free, vegetarian, etc. If possible, find out what other people may be bringing so that the family doesn't receive the same dish four nights in a row.

When we send food to a friend or neighbour, none of us wants to seem miserly so we tend to over-prepare. Unless the leftovers can be frozen, much of the dish – for example, salads – ends up being thrown away. So be realistic about portions.

One-dish main courses or soups are probably the easiest, for both the cook and the recipient. Designed to be made ahead, they're also no problem to heat up when it's time to serve.

Lighter appetites might relish a cold salad of tangy tuna or fresh fruit as a side dish or for the main meal at lunch. And if day-to-day pressures find you too short of time to create an entrée, you can still bring a smile with a mouthwatering sour cream coffee cake.

Bring the food in disposable containers so that the recipient doesn't have to worry later about returning serving items or figuring out who they belong to. If you must bring it in a permanent container, put your name on the bottom on a piece of tape.

Whatever your choice, you'll be showing someone you care and will be greatly appreciated for it.

THE MOST AMAZING DECADENT MUSHROOM LASAGNA

This recipe is adapted from a recipe by Hugh Fearnley-Whittingstall, author of numerous incredible cookbooks. If Fontina cheese is unavailable, substitute grated mozzarella.

For the Bechamel
4 tbsp. unsalted butter
1/2 cup all-purpose flour
2 cups whole milk, warmed
1/3 cup grated Parmesan
1/3 cup grated Fontina
3/4 to 1 cup pareve chicken broth
1/3 cup grated Parmesan
1/3 cup grated Fontina
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste lasagna noodles* about 3/4 lb. fresh chanterelle mushrooms, cleaned and sliced very thinly about 1/2 cup Parmesan about 1/2 cup Fontina

*Note: You can use either fresh or dried lasagna noodles. Fresh are always my first choice, and contrary to what some might tell you, you don't need to pre-cook them; you can just layer them and bake them. There are also dried lasagna noodles that you don't need to pre-cook. They are thin enough that they bake when you bake the lasagna. The nice thing about these is that they tend to stay al dente when baked.

Preheat the oven to 375. To make the bechamel: in a saucepan over medium heat, melt the butter. Whisk in the flour and cook, whisking, for about 2 minutes. Slowly add the milk, whisking constantly to smooth out all the lumps. Turn down the heat to medium-low and add 1/3 cup of Parmesan and 1/3 cup of fontina, whisking to incorporate: Whisk in enough pareve chicken broth to make a fairly loose sauce. It should be pourable but not thin.

If you are using the dried lasagna that is not pre-cooked, it's a good idea to make the sauce a bit thinner than you normally would. Season to taste with salt and plenty of freshly ground pepper.

Assemble the lasagna: in a baking dish about 8 inches square, add about 1/4 cup of the Bechamel. Place a layer of lasagna noodles, then another 1/4 cup Bechamel and 1/3 of the chanterelles. Top the chanterelles evenly with a thin layer of grated Parmesan and fontina. Top with about one-half cup Bechamel, covering the filling evenly. Top with an even layer of lasagna noodles, then repeat the layering two more times. Add a final layer of lasagna noodles, then the rest of the Bechamel and some grated Parmesan and fontina.

Bake the lasagna until the noodles are tender and the filling is bubbling, about 45 minutes if using the dried uncooked noodles (for fresh it might be about 25 minutes). Let sit for about 15 minutes before cutting and serving. Serves 8 to 10.

SALMON PLATTER WITH CAPER DRESSING

6 oz. small boiling potatoes
1 1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 cup fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. drained bottled capers, rinsed and finely chopped, plus additional whole capers for sprinkling
1 1/2 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 1/2 tsp. sugar
1/2 cup extra-virgin olive oil
1 small red onion, halved lengthwise, then very thinly sliced crosswise
1 firm-ripe avocado
1 cucumber, thinly sliced crosswise
12 oz. thinly sliced smoked salmon
8 oz. sliced dark bread, cut into triangles

Peel potatoes and cut into 1/4-in. thick slices, then transfer to a 2-quart saucepan and cover with water by 1 in. Add 1/2 tsp. salt and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, partially covered, until potatoes are tender, 5 to 8 minutes. Drain, then transfer to a bowl.

Meanwhile, whisk together lemon juice, chopped capers, mustard, sugar and remaining 3/4 tsp. salt, until sugar and salt are dissolved. Then whisk in oil until emulsified.

Toss potatoes gently with 1/4 cup dressing. Toss onion with 1/4 cup dressing in another bowl and let stand 5 minutes.

Peel and pit avocado, then cut into 1/4-in. thick slices.

Arrange potatoes, avocado, cucumber, onion, salmon and bread on a large platter and sprinkle with whole capers. Drizzle with some dressing and serve remainder on the side. Makes 4 main-course servings.

Personalized Education Helps Students Succeed

For many students, the traditional classroom format is not effective in providing the education they need to succeed in today's world. These students often have a mild learning or cognitive disability, or are simply not motivated to succeed academically.

These students need a different educational approach, and a lot more individual teacher support and motivation than is available at mainstream schools. One school helping this kind of student to thrive is North Toronto Academy. NTA is a specialized school for students in grades 7-12 who learn best in a non-traditional setting that embraces their differences.

NTA keeps classes small, usually just 4-6 students, and employs differentiated instructional techniques, such as an interactive "coaching" approach to teaching. At NTA students work with their teacher 1:1, vs. the traditional "class lecture" method. Teachers adapt their teaching style and evaluation strategies to match students' strengths. The school also emphasizes organization, time management and study skills, especially in Grades 7-9, and French is optional.

Flexible after school options are available for students to take individual credit courses at NTA instead of at their regular school. This is ideal for students when they need intensive and individualized teacher support to earn the grades they want in courses they find most difficult.

North Toronto Academy is located at 3293 Yonge St. (north of Lawrence) www.northtorontoacademy.com

COOKIE-CUTTERS ARE FOR GINGERBREAD MEN
You're unique – an individual – so why squeeze into the conformity of a cookie-cutter education? North Toronto Academy is ideal for grade 7-12 students who need more individual teacher attention and support – like those with an IEP, mild learning disability or low motivation.
With small classes, extra focus on time management, organization and study skills, and a 'French-optional' curriculum, you're bound to find that our personalized education approach is perfect for you.
An education that's as unique as you are. What a smart idea

Making the Grade after High School: College, University and Beyond

Seven years ago, after a long career as a university teacher and advisor, Judy Libman was convinced that high school and post-secondary students needed more individualized assistance. Soon after winning York University's highest teaching award, she founded Ambitions Educational Consulting, a unique counselling service for students and parents. Since then, she has worked with over 500 students on their way to academic success.

Judy Libman advises each student as a unique individual: no "one-size-fits-all" answers here. For high school students, Libman identifies university or college programs that will provide the best match for a student's interests, goals and learning style. Her familiarity with programs in Ontario and across Canada gives students a wide range of choices.

Libman is also well-known for her expert counseling in US college admissions. She serves as a consultant for US college admissions at several top Toronto private schools.

For students already in university, Libman provides advising on career options, graduate programs, and professional school admissions. Her longtime specialty is the medical school admissions process, with an admirable track record of success.

Oraynu – A Sunday School Families Love!

"My son really looks forward to Sunday mornings."

This comment is typical of the parents whose children attend Oraynu. We teach Jewish history and culture from a Humanistic perspective, focusing on values.

Children are truly engaged at Oraynu and learn through a variety of meaningful experiential approaches.

The children "do" and "act" through lively, rich participatory discussions, Family Education events, tzedakah projects, music, Hebrew, crafts and community performances at festivals. Our family holiday celebrations are warm and full of fun.

"My daughter feels good about being Jewish."

Building a Jewish identity at Oraynu is enjoyable as the children experience positive affirmations of their Jewishness in every class.

"The B'nai Mitzvah blew me away. I was so moved by the ceremony."

Imagine a B'nai Mitzvah program where students choose their own projects, based on modern Jewish heroes, ancient sages, humour, authors, anti-semitism, etc. Individual ceremonies are offered; Torah reading is optional.

If your family is secular and looking for a school that feels right, perhaps you belong at Oraynu. Intercultural families are very welcome.

Judy Libman • ambitions educational consulting

The hardest questions in school aren't on the exam.

• How should I choose a university or college? • What programs and career options should I consider? • How can I improve my chances for admission to a professional school? • Should I consider graduate school? • How can I study better, not harder? • How do I get back on track if I have had academic problems? • What if I have no focus yet? • Everyone always told me to keep my options open - so, now what?

Expert individual educational counselling for high school and post-secondary students.

"A HUGE amount of my success is due to you and all your input. You set me on the right track, put things into perspective, provided me with excellent direct feedback and you made me laugh. THANK YOU."

Need Help with the University Application Process?

Approaching application deadlines. Personal statements. Preparing for interviews. Distinguishing yourself from the crowd. It can all seem overwhelming.

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many undergraduate and professional programs including medicine, law, business and dentistry, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to postsecondary schools have doubled in the last ten years, gaining admission to university requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Expert advice can make the process less daunting, allowing students to maximize their chances of success. We work one-on-one with our clients throughout the application process. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

The Leo Baeck Day School:
a meaningful choice for your child's education

The Leo Baeck Day School is a Reform Jewish day school with two campuses in the Greater Toronto area: one in Thornhill and the other in midtown Toronto. We are also an International Baccalaureate (IB) Candidate School, the only Jewish day school in Canada to hold this prestigious designation, and will be completing the application process this year for certification as an IB Middle Years Program school.

At Leo Baeck, we work to create a caring, respectful atmosphere in which each student learns to make positive choices in his or her own life as a Jew and a citizen of the world. In preschool, children learn to get along with their peers while acquiring early literacy and numeracy skills. In Grades 1 to 5, the day is divided into thirds: one-third English Language Arts, one-third Math, Science and Social Studies, and one-third Hebrew/Judaic Studies. As well, Music, Art, Drama, Technology, Library, French and Physical Education are integrated to provide an enriched learning experience. Grades 6 to 8 make up a "school within a school," with an advisor program, student council and block scheduling. These elements help students to develop the independence necessary for success in high school and beyond.

This year, we welcome Eric Petersiel, RJE, as our Head of School, along with Jonathan Harris as our new South Campus principal. We are excited to be embarking on a new adventure in the 2009-10 school year - and we hope that you and your family will join us!

Ancient Israeli remedy could be anti-cancer vitamin

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

JERUSALEM – Inspired by an ancient text, an Israeli scientist has discovered an herbal antioxidant that could turn out to be a vital treatment for cancer.

It's Dr. Fuad Fares' huge secret, one that's big enough to make sure his laboratory is locked tight when he's not there. The Israeli scientist has been looking into the potency of ancient herbal treatments and has discovered what he believes is a new family of antioxidants.

He's tested the secret compound based on an inedible plant that grows in Israel – and he's found that it shows excellent results in stopping prostate and colon cancer in mice, and in human cancer cells in vitro.

Unable to disclose the plant's variety pending further tests, Fares hopes that the plant, first described for its medicinal value in Arabic centuries ago, produces an entirely new antioxidant molecule that can stop cancer in its tracks. It could be ingested as a food additive, or like a vitamin, he hopes.

The body of research in scientific literature on antioxidants to stop the spread of cancer is growing. Scientists know that antioxidants such as lycopenes, found in tomatoes, fight free radicals, which can lead to cancer. They also know that glucosinolates found in cabbage varieties have anti-cancer properties, too.

New tests on the mystery compound done at a University of Haifa lab, in the Carmel Medical Center in Israel, have been overwhelmingly good, and in the future, it could be added to our arsenal for fighting cancer.

Using a crude extract of the plant, Fares, an Israeli Arab, gave his test plant to mice as a preventive "medicine." Cancer was then introduced to the mice.

Those given the crude extract were able to fight off the cancer tumours much better than the control group – only 20 per cent of the treated mice developed cancer, while 80 per cent of the control group developed cancer.

Dr. Fuad Fares is trying to develop a herbal compound, based on ancient texts, that he hopes will prove to be effective in the fight against cancer.

As well, Fares noted, in the test group, the tumours were significantly smaller than in the control group.

In a second test, mice with cancer were given the plant-based extract as a medicine. "When we looked at the cells inside the tumours, we saw these compounds induced cell death and decreased the tumours by 70 to 80 per cent compared to the control group," Fares said.

He also tested the extract on human cancer cells in vitro and saw "a dramatic effect."

After Fares purifies the compound, he hopes it will yield a brand new class of antioxidants.

"Just used as an extract it seems to be effective," said Fares, who is also a director of Modigene, a biopharmaceutical company he created while doing postdoctoral work at Washington University.

Modigene uses patented technology to develop longer-lasting, proprietary versions of approved therapeutic proteins that currently generate billions in annual global sales.

Now Fares is working on identifying the mystery substance and will apply for a patent – and release the secret – if the compound is indeed unique.

After purifying it, he believes he might get even more startling results. And it could well be a medical breakthrough, said Fares, who found mention of the plant in an ancient herbal remedy book written centuries ago in the region.

"It's known that antioxidants help cancer prevention and treatment. We are focusing on plants not known in the literature. It's not food, but a medicinal plant," said Fares, who declined to say whether or not inspiration came from a book by Maimonides, the famous Jewish doctor and rabbinic scholar who wrote medical treatises in Arabic in the 12th century.

The plant, he said, is something that grows in Israel and is not something people eat.

As for more details, he said he's sorry, but we'll just have to wait.

Negotiation is the path to statehood, Abbas says

Ha'aretz

JERUSALEM — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said on Monday that negotiation is the only path to statehood, espousing non-violence after his Fatah party backed an option of "resistance" against Israeli occupation.

"We are peace seekers," the western-backed leader said at a cabinet meeting in Ramallah of the Palestinian Authority.

"The main and the only path is the path of peace and negotiations. We don't have any other path, and we do not wish to use any other path."

It was the cabinet's first meeting since the dominant Fatah movement, which Abbas heads, held a congress this month, at which he reasserted the Palestinian option of "resistance" against Israel's occupation of the West Bank.

He did not define resistance but gave examples of civil disobedience. He said terrorism was counter-productive.

But the language, adopted in a policy document, drew criticism from Israel, which pursued peace negotiations with Abbas until talks stalled nearly a year ago and which expects him to resume talks in the near future.

Analysts said that at the recent congress Abbas was engaged in a political balancing act with the West, Israel and factions of his own movement.

"Abbas was seeking to reduce American and Israeli anger after the congress," said political analyst Hani Masri.

"He wants to reiterate that nothing has changed after the congress. He is adopting the same path."

Analyst Basem Zubeidi of Bir Zeit university said that Abbas "spoke about resistance at the congress in order to satisfy all factions, and in order to regain legitimacy.

"Abbas wants to assure everyone, and I think he has succeeded in doing that and he has succeeded in showing that his way is the way of negotiations."

Mahmoud Abbas

Fatah's congress in Bethlehem was its first in 20 years and first without the late Yasser Arafat to dominate proceedings. Palestinian commentators said Abbas was strengthened by the election to its executive body of men from a younger generation.

But Abbas may face problems in Fatah's Central Committee in the future if he is seen to dismiss the option of "resistance" out of hand, the analysts said.

Some Arab commentators have criticized the Fatah congress for blunting the Palestinian independence movement.

In his statement on Monday, Abbas said that Israel must stop West Bank settlement activity in all its forms and, if it does so, peace talks will resume.

In related news, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said on Monday that Arab states will be willing to recognize and normalize ties with Israel only after a just and comprehensive Middle East peace is achieved, but not before.

In Washington for talks with the U.S. administration, Mubarak told the al-Ahram daily that the Arab experience with Israel with stalled peace talks in the wake of the 1991 Madrid peace conference "did not encourage" taking steps toward normalization of relations with the Jewish state.

U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell in July called on Arab states to take "meaningful steps toward normalization of relations with Israel."

"I affirmed to [U.S.] President [Barack] Obama in Cairo that the Arab initiative offers recognition of Israel and normalization with it after, and not before, achieving a just and comprehensive peace," Mubarak told al-Ahram.

"I told him that some Arab states which had mutual trade representation offices with Israel could consider reopening those offices if Israel commits to stopping settlement [building] and resumes final status negotiations with the Palestinian Authority where they left off with [former Israeli prime minister Ehud] Olmert's government," Mubarak said.

Head of Al Qaeda group killed in Gaza

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Hamas crushed an Al Qaeda-inspired group in an hours-long standoff that came to a fiery end when a large explosion killed the group's leader inside his Gaza home on Saturday.

The fighting was sparked by a rebellious sermon given by the radical Muslim group's leader, and his dramatic death put an end to the greatest internal challenge to Hamas rule since it took control of Gaza two years ago.

In all, the fighting claimed 24 lives, including that of a senior Hamas official who Israel says masterminded the abduction of Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit. It was the highest death toll in the territory since the Israel-Hamas war earlier this year.

The crackdown targeted Jund Ansar Allah, or the Soldiers of the Companions of God, one of a number of small, shadowy groups that are even more radical than Hamas. The decisive confrontation, in which 95 group members were arrested, solidified Hamas' iron rule in Gaza.

The fighting broke out late Friday when Hamas security men surrounded a mosque in the southern Gaza town of Rafah on the Egyptian border, where about 100 members of Jund Ansar Allah were holed up.

Their leader, Abdel-Latif Moussa, provoked Hamas by declaring Gaza an Islamic emirate during a Friday prayer sermon and warning its leaders against invading his mosque.

Ismail Haniyeh

The Hamas forces raided the mosque, setting off a fierce gunbattle. Flares lit up the sky and the sound of machine gun fire echoed throughout the night.

Moussa escaped with some bodyguards to his home where another standoff ensued.

Early Saturday, an explosion went off as Hamas was trying to convince Moussa to surrender, said Ihab Ghussein, a Hamas Interior Ministry spokesman.

"The so-called Moussa has committed suicide… killing a mediator who had been sent to him to persuade him and his followers to hand themselves over to the government," Ghussein told the Associated Press.

It is unclear whether Moussa detonated the explosives vest he was wearing, or whether it was one of his bodyguards.

Dr. Moaiya Hassanain of the Palestinian Health Ministry in Gaza said 24 people were killed, including six Hamas police officers and an 11-year-old girl. At least 150 people were wounded, he said.

Hamas confirmed one of its casualties was a high-ranking commander, Abu Jibril Shimali, who Israel said orchestrated the capture three years ago of Schalit, who is still being held by Hamas.

Speaking in a mosque before weekly prayers, Moussa – known to followers by the Al Qaeda-style nom de guerre Abu al-Nour al-Maqdessi – announced the start of theocratic rule in the Palestinian territories, starting at Rafah, and vowed to implement Islamic laws.

"We declare the birth of the Islamic emirate," declared Moussa, a heavily bearded, middle-aged cleric in a red robe, who was guarded by four black-clad, masked men with assault rifles. One wore what appeared to be an explosive suicide belt.

An audience of several hundred men filled the mosque with cheers and shouts. Al Qaeda uses the historical term "emirate" to mean clerical rule across the Islamic world.

Ismail Haniyeh, who heads Gaza's Hamas government, denied in his Friday sermon that there were any non-Palestinian gunmen in the territory, as alleged by Israel, which charges that veterans of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have taken up residence.

"Such groups do not exist on the soil of the Gaza Strip… there are no fighters in Gaza except Gazan fighters," he said.

Such "Zionist propaganda" from Israel was simply an attempt to turn the world against Hamas, he said.

A Hamas spokesperson said Saturday that Moussa had ties to Palestinian Authority security forces.

Hamas official Sami Abu Zuhri called Moussa's speech "wrong thinking" and, in a clear reference to Al Qaeda, added that Hamas "has no affiliation with foreign groups." Hamas' Interior Ministry was blunter, calling Moussa "mad."

Moussa's group announced its existence in Gaza two months ago, after three of its members were killed in a border raid on an Israeli base in which gunmen rode on horseback.

Outside the mosque on Friday, some 100 masked fighters of the group in Pakistani-style dress, wearing their hair long in a style believed to imitate that of the prophet Muhammad, carried automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenade launchers.

Men of the Hamas armed wing and security forces took positions nearby.

Moussa warned Hamas against implementing a decision to take over the mosque where he led prayers for his followers: "If they approach the mosque, they should know their days will be cut short," Moussa said.

He urged "everyone who has a weapon" to join the group and carry out decisions to be issued by the armed wing in coming weekly sermons. The group believes democracy is prohibited by Islam because it follows earthly law instead of God's word.

"Who are you afraid of? America? Britain? France? The European Union? You should fear only God," Moussa said in a warning to Hamas leaders seeking dialogue with the West.

Saeb Erekat, a member of the rival Fatah group in the West Bank and a senior peace negotiator with Israel, described the situation in Gaza as alarming.

"Gaza is going down the drain in chaos and lawlessness," he told the Associated Press.

Israel unilaterally ended its occupation of the Gaza Strip in 2005 and withdrew its forces. Islamist radicals began to surface in Gaza following the takeover of the Israeli-blockaded enclave by Hamas in 2007, when it routed the forces of the secular Fatah movement of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas.

Jewish teenager on trial in Iran

JTA

JERUSALEM — Iran will try a Jewish teenager during a mass trial of opposition supporters.

Yaghoghil Shaolian, 19, is among 25 defendants whose trial opened Sunday for their involvement in protests following the June 12 re-election of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Many in Iran and the international community have said the vote was rigged for Ahmadinejad.

About 135 defendants have been brought to trial in large groups. They are accused of participating in illegal demonstrations, vandalism and "following the line of foreign media," according to the indictment, the French news agency AFP reported.

Shaolian was arrested after throwing stones at a bank in central Tehran, the Associated Press reported Sunday, citing the Fars news agency. Shaolian told Fars he was not an activist but was swept along by the protesters.

The AP cited Iran's only Jewish parliamentarian, Siamak Mereh Sedq, as saying Shaolian's arrest was not related to his religion. Sedq confirmed that Shaolian is Jewish.

About 25,000 Jews live in Iran, the largest Middle East Jewish community next to Israel.

Opposition leaders have called the trials "show trials," as did the United States. Several hundred protesters remain in prison.

Israel Briefs

No Gaza repeat: Bibi

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel "will not repeat this mistake," referring to the unilateral Gaza withdrawal. "What was done cannot be undone, Netanyahu told the cabinet. "We can only conduct genuine introspection and say that the unilateral evacuation from the Gaza Strip brought neither peace nor security." He added: "To my regret, the opposite occurred, and we know that Gaza became a Hamas base under Iranian control from which thousands of missiles have been fired, including in the last campaign. In short, this did not bring peace." Netanyahu also said the government is committed to "the rehabilitation of our brothers," the Gaza evacuees, calling their plight a "tragedy."

Two hurt in shooting

Two Israelis were wounded after Palestinians opened fire on their car as it drove near Ramallah. The men were attacked last Wednesday evening and were able to drive to nearby Ma'aleh Levona. They were taken to a hospital for treatment, according to reports. A group calling itself The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the Imad Mughniyeh groups claimed responsibility for the attack. Also on Aug. 12, an Israeli car was damaged near Hebron by stone-throwing Palestinians, and a Molotov cocktail was hurled at an Israeli car driving near Bethlehem, causing some damage. The number of attempted attacks on both sides of the Green Line has risen significantly since March, Ha'aretz reported.

Rabbis fast to stop flu

Two leading Israeli rabbis declared Aug. 26 to be a day of fasting and prayer because of the swine flu epidemic. The unusual 24-hour fast was announced in a joint letter published by Rabbi Shlomo Amar, Israel's chief rabbi of the country's Sephardi community, and Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of the Shas party. The rabbis called for fighting the disease by "medical means and by maintaining excellent hygiene," but also through fasting and prayer from sunset Tuesday, Aug. 25 to sunset Wednesday, Aug. 26. The swine flu started out relatively slowly and mildly in Israel, with the first local case confirmed in May and the first death only late last month. But, sparking belated widespread media attention and worry among the Israeli public, its spread has accelerated in August, with more than 2,000 cases and nine deaths confirmed.

Soldier sentenced for theft

A soldier convicted of stealing a Palestinian's credit card during Israel's military operation in Gaza was sentenced to prison. The soldier, who was arrested three months ago, was sentenced to 7-1/2 months and was demoted. He confessed to the charges and returned the money he withdrew from ATM machines in Israel using the card.

$1M for mermaid proof

A town near Haifa is offering $1 million (US) for proof that a mermaid lives in its waters. In recent months, several residents of Kiryat Yam have called city hall to report sightings of a half-woman, half-fish doing tricks such as jumping in the air like a dolphin, before disappearing into the sea. People have been gathering at the beach in the evenings, when the mermaid is said to emerge, trying to get a look at the creature and take her picture. A photograph of the mermaid is reportedly enough to claim the reward.

Israeli archaeologists excluded from Ramallah meeting

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israel Antiquities Authority said it was excluded from an international archeological conference in Ramallah.

The IAA condemned the World Archeological Congress in a letter to its president. The conference, called "Overcoming Structural Violence," discussed in part several regions in Jerusalem where excavations are being conducted by the IAA.

"In this way the organization is introducing the [Palestinian-Israeli] conflict into the professional side of archaeology," the IAA said in an Aug. 14. news release.

The IAA was informed of the conference by e-mail last week as the meeting was opening in the West Bank, according to the letter.

Conference participants visited the Temple Mount, which the conference refers to by the Muslim term Haram al Sharif and the City of David Archeological Park in Jerusalem without coordinating with the IAA, deputy director Uzi Dahari charged.

"It would be best if the World Archeological Congress would focus on archeology and not on politics," Dahari said.

"We remind you that this is a conference organized by the World Archeological Congress and not a Palestinian archeological organization," the letter said.

"This requires you to make it universal. The omission to include or invite Israeli speakers to address issues that directly affect their daily work shows that this conference is certainly not that. We need not remind you that one of the principles governing the WAC is the promotion of dialogue between archeologists, but this conference is a monologue."

The letter adds that the conference program is "full of abstracts condemning Israeli archeology" containing "huge numbers of inaccuracies."

Jew elected to Fatah Party council

JTA

JERUSALEM — A former Israeli Jew was elected to the Palestinian Fatah party's governing body.

Uri Davis, 66, a sociology professor at Al-Quds University in eastern Jerusalem, is the first Jew ever to become a member of the Revolutionary Council. Elections were held this month during Fatah's sixth party congress, its first in 20 years. The official list of winners of elections to the Revolutionary Council was published Saturday.

Davis was among more than 600 candidates for 80 open spots on the 128-member governing body. At least 70 of the seats were taken by new members, 20 come from Gaza, 11 are women and four are Christians.

Davis received Palestinian citizenship after waiving his Israeli citizenship in the 1980s in protest over Israel's policies in Gaza and the West Bank.

On Aug. 13, all of Fatah's leaders in Gaza reportedly quit over alleged irregularities in elections also held at the congress for the 18-member Central Committee, the party's highest decision-making body.

Tarantino shines in alt-history vengeance tale

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

To the comprehensive list of Holocaust films, you can add something decidedly different.

The latest – and best – movie from Quentin Tarantino (Pulp Fiction, Kill Bill) picks up where Michael Chabon's fantastical novel The Yiddish Policemen's Union left off, but instead of postulating a Jewish state in Alaska, Inglourious Basterds posits a World War II in which Jewish guerillas and civilians are the guiding forces behind history.

The film's title refers to an outfit set up by the U.S. government and led by the non–Jewish Southern Lieut. Aldo Raine (Brad Pitt). The unit consists of the toughest Jewish soldiers available who are sent into German-occupied France with one goal: to sow terror by killing and scalping as many Nazis as they can.

They soon succeed beyond their wildest dreams, not incidentally driving Adolf Hitler (Martin Wuttke) to paroxysms of anger and despair. Meanwhile, Shoshanna Dreyfus (Mélanie Laurent), a young French Jewish refugee from the countryside who's living under an assumed name in occupied Paris, has a plan of her own to seek vengeance on the Nazis.

That only scratches the surface of an audacious, darkly funny and suspenseful film, one which brings in a whole passel of provocative characters, both real and imagined, most notably Nazi Minister of Propaganda Josef Goebbels (Sylvester Groth); Bridget von Hammersmark, (Diane Kruger) a German actress, à la Marlene Deitrich, who's working with the Allies; Sgt. Donny Donowitz (Eli Roth), the basterd nicknamed "The Bear Jew," and Col. Hans Landa (Christoph Waltz), also known as "The Jew Hunter," the SD officer assigned the task of tracking down and stopping the basterds.

Waltz, a little-known theatre and film actor, deservedly won the best actor award at the Cannes film festival for his expert portrayal of Landa, a "cultured" linguist who suggests television's Lt. Columbo, if that detective was an evil man who used his charm to subtly trip up and expose his enemies.

On every level, from the acting to the cinematography to the intricate screenplay, Inglourious Basterds shines as an example of first-rate filmmaking. (The film's title is a deliberately misspelled translation from the German, a symbolic calling card left by the "basterds" to confuse their enemies.)

Tarantino still proffers his trademark movie references – to German, French and American films – but for once they're perfectly integrated parts of a whole, not standalone distractions. Nor does he pander to the audience, as he has in the past.

Inglourious Basterds is a scrupulously sober, rueful examination of the necessity for extracting retribution, but one that never glorifies the violence committed in the process. That's a remarkable balancing act, since even Edward Zwick, in Defiance, his fact-based story of the Jewish partisan Bielski brothers, felt the need to resort to a rabble-rousing Rambo-like climax.

There is one atypically gleeful – and amazing – scene in the movie, the ultimate "what if" scenario revolving around Jewish vengeance (to say more would spoil the surprise), but even that is carried off with responsible, witty aplomb.

Perhaps it takes a non–Jewish filmmaker such as Tarantino to completely avoid Jewish stereotypes – that bold, powerful Jews exist in the film's created world is a given – but Inglourious Basterds subverts the obvious expectations and portraits inherent in most bad – and good – Holocaust movies.

Raine's men, for example, are treated as equals and not as support to his considerable exploits – they're avenging the murder of their people, after all. But more significantly, Inglourious Basterds evokes a "reality" that so many Jews, understandably, wish had existed during World War II, a world in which Jews, as in the State of Israel, could have taken charge of their own destiny without being beholden to non–Jews who, mostly, were indifferent to their fate.

Brad Pitt leads the band of Jewish soldiers in Inglorious Basterds.

Remarkably, and utilizing all the cinematic skills at his command, Tarantino has given us a taste of what such a world would have been like.

Film producer Ari Lantos follows in his father's footsteps

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When Ari Lantos was growing up in Toronto, his father told him to pursue any career except movies. This is a cutthroat business, he told him.

Lantos' father should know. His name is Robert Lantos, and he is Canadian entertainment royalty, the producer of major features such as Exotica, Eastern Promises and Joshua Then and Now.

Lantos, 28, didn't take his dad's advice, though. He immersed himself in film, and now he's stepping out from his father's shadow to produce zany comedies for the under-35 crowd. His upcoming feature You Might As Well Live premières Aug. 28 in Toronto.

Ari Lantos, centre, has immersed himself in film.

You Might As Well Live is a film the elder Lantos wouldn't likely touch. It stars an unconfident man who wants to make something of his life, and his adventures include tripping out on magic mushrooms, roller-skating with a transvestite and consulting his catatonic mother. It's like a Canadian Napoleon Dynamite, but a lot weirder. It's an angle Lantos welcomes, he says in an interview.

"I was drawn into the film's dark sense of humour and offbeat sensibility," he notes. "This is definitely for the under-35 crowd."

Depending on the success of You Might As Well Live during its Toronto run, the film may open in major markets such as Montreal and Vancouver, Lantos adds.

With a $1.14-million budget, he was able to wrangle some big names for the project, including actors Michael Madsen and Stephen McHattie. The film is produced under Lantos' company, APB Productions, although he received some advice from his father's firm, Serendipity Point Films.

This isn't Lantos' first foray into film. He produced Real Time, which follows a hit man named Reuban, played by veteran actor Randy Quaid. He's also produced a short film, Waldo Cummerbund, shown at the 2005 Toronto International Film Festival.

Film wasn't his first passion, though. Water polo was Lantos' life until he enrolled at McGill University for cultural studies. As a fixture on the junior national team, he had to decide on moving to Calgary to progress to the senior team or stay in Montreal. He chose the latter, and opted for a career in film, an area in which he feels comfortable.

In the coming months, Lantos will be overseeing a new film shoot in Rome and Montreal: Barney's Version, an adaptation of the Mordecai Richler book. Starring Paul Giamatti and Dustin Hoffman, Barney's Version is the kind of film that marries Montreal Jewish culture and strong storytelling, Lantos says.

"In one way, Judaism is a character in this film," he says, mentioning Montreal dining spot Moishe's Steak House will be a setting for several scenes.

Barney's Version will also be the first time Lantos works with his dad directly. He is handling the day-to-day issues, from talent relations to meeting with the director of photography. Is he looking forward to or dreading being on set with his dad?

Lantos tactfully avoids the question and replies, "My dad has no qualms at yelling at people no matter who they are."

Only a few years into his producer role, Lantos has learned a few lessons about this "cutthroat" business of making films. He says producers should work hands-on with distribution companies to ensure the film gets the proper marketing and publicity treatment.

He tends to plan his life "three movies ahead" so he can always be managing some sort of development process. He also firmly believes in respecting people you work with, from actors to production crew. "If you can communicate properly with those colleagues, it makes the whole project more enjoyable to work on," he says.

Even though Barney's Version will take up much of his time, Lantos is setting his sights beyond the Richler adaptation. He would like to produce a quality horror film, a project filled with depth and originality. He'd like to oversee a Canadian horror flick that actually crosses over to the United States, a rare feat.

If there's any strategic executive to make that happen, it's Lantos. Forget his lineage for now; he's got a keen eye and determination to make Canada a Hollywood success story.

MIRVISH DEVELOPS FRINGE MUSICAL COMEDY, TO PANASONIC THEATRE

Ten years after Mirvish Productions discovered an unknown musical at the Toronto Fringe Festival called The Drowsy Chaperone and pumped it into a huge theatrical hit, the Toronto-based theatrical company has announced it hopes to do the same with the recent Fringe Festival musical comedy, My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding.

An expanded and reworked commercial production of the comedy, which was written by David Hein and his wife, Irene Carl Sankoff, is booked to open at the Panasonic Theatre on Nov. 7.

"My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding is that rare theatrical success story: a show that seemingly came out of nowhere and created intense buzz as soon as its first showing ended," said a Mirvish press release issued last week.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish Wiccan Wedding moves from the Fringe to Mirvish.

David Mirvish also waxed enthusiastic about his company's latest theatrical find.

"When members of my staff saw the very first performances of this hilarious and touching musical, they reported back to me with such enthusiasm that I even took my out-of-town guests to a performance," he said.

"At the performance we attended, the crowd went wild, and they had good reason to do so. There is no doubt this is a special work from exciting, new musical theatre voices. We feel privileged to play a part in bringing the work to a bigger audience."

The story involves a mother who feels lost in life and wrestles with her identity. A new job brings new opportunities and a chance to discover her sexuality and rediscover her faith. The musical began two years ago with what is now its title song, which Hein wrote about his mother's real-life wedding.

The song quickly became a crowd favourite and Hein performed it across North America. He and Carl Sankoff wrote additional material and stitched together the many stories around their real-life experience that people wanted to hear.

Shaw and Stratford festivals veteran Lisa Horner has been cast as the mother, and Andrew Lamb has been chosen to direct. More cast announcements are forthcoming.

German Lawsuit: The American Jewish Committee has filed a lawsuit against the German arm of the online books giant Amazon for selling more than 50 Holocaust denial books that normally "are only available under the counter in far-right extremist shops," said Deidre Berger, AJC's German director, according to German news reports.

Supportive of the lawsuit, German MP Sebastian Edathy, of the Bundestag's interior affairs committee, said he found it shocking that the company was unwilling to remove books that "stir up anti-Semitism and undermine the democratic consensus." Christine Höger, a spokesperson for Amazon Germany, has argued that removing the books would be tantamount to censorship.

Arts in Brief

• The Art Gallery of Ontario has extended its exhibition "Surreal Things" for another two weeks due to a strong response from the public. Surreal Things highlights the work of surrealist artists and designers such as Salvador Dali, Giorgio de Chirico, Marcel Duchamp, Max Ernst, René Magritte, Joan Miró, Meret Oppenheim, Man Ray and Elsa Schiaparelli. Originally slated to close Aug. 30, it now runs until Sept. 13.

• Steven Page, formerly of Barenaked Ladies fame, sings songs by Leonard Cohen, Elvis Costello, Paul Simon, Rufus Wainwright, Radiohead and Jane Siberry. The concert, featuring the Art of Time Ensemble, takes place March 4, 2010, at Massey Hall.

Teenage protagonist finds new worldview in novel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Veteran Toronto television screenwriter Jennifer Cowan's first full-length book, earthgirl, a young adult novel about contemporary teenagers, was recently published by Groundwood Books.

When 16-year-old Sabine Solomon is riding her bicycle in downtown Toronto, she has the remains of a McDonald's lunch pelted at her by a woman idling in her minivan. The teenager's angry reaction leads her to an epiphany about the ecological injustices in the world.

Jennifer Cowan, author of earthgirl

Reflective of the times we live in, her skirmish with the fast-food-throwing women in Kensington Market is immediately seen on YouTube, posted by of one of Sabine's friends.

The subsequent events of the novel unfold through her eyes, primarily through her Internet blog posts.

Sabine's personal revolution leads to changes in relationships with her family and her longtime materialistic friends. It also leads to her first love, an intimate relationship with Vray, a dedicated environmentalist and eco-warrior, that leads her along a dangerous and destructive road paved with good intentions.

In her newly discovered global consciousness of recycling and organic foods, pollution, consumerism and what she sees as injustices, her friends become her opponents and strangers become her friends with whom she communicates through her blog.

In her debut novel, Cowan entertains and educates about ecological issues and relationships.

"One of the unique aspects of the novel," Cowan says, "is that the blog is active [sabinetheearthgirl.wordpress.com], so that readers can communicate with Sabine and follow her musings on the environment and popular culture.

"What I do is write on the blog in the character voice of Sabine and correspond with readers of all ages across Canada and the United States."

Cowan is currently working on a sequel to earthgirl that will follow Sabine to university and explore her new-found independence and the concept of helicopter parents – the "hovering" generation that considers their children as their best buddies.

Cowan was writer and executive story editor for shows including Producing Parker, Show Me Yours and Traders. She has written multiple scripts and teen soaps including Edgemont, which won the 2004 Leo Award for best screenwriting in a youth or children's series. She was also a 2004 Gemini Award nominee and received recognition for many other shows including the teen series Ready or Not.

Cowan has produced arts, pop culture and entertainment magazine programs and documentaries for CBC, CTV, TVOntario and Citytv.

The focus on computer communication through website links, blogging, Facebook, Twitter and other communication highways adds a sense of reality to the fiction and should make it more relevant to the young readers it targets. It may also be an eye-opener for their parents in some cases.

For young people and adults, earthgirl opens many areas of discussion about how far we want to go to save the world, as well as about peer pressures and the power of instant communications.

Cowan will appear at the International Festival of Authors on Friday, Oct. 30, at 10:30 a.m. at Harbourfront Centre.

Musical 'gives life' to his songs, Neil Sedaka says

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

There is a lot more to 69-year-old singer/songwriter Neil Sedaka than songs about first love recorded back when the baby boomers were in their teens.

Sedaka's songs are showcased in the musical Breaking Up Is Hard To Do, now through Sept. 14 at Stage West Dinner Theatre in Mississauga.

"It was an honour to have these songs written into a musical, and gives life to these songs," Sedaka said in a phone interview.

The jukebox musical, set at a Catskills resort on Labour Day weekend in 1960, follows the Eric Jackson and Ben Winters story of two girls in search of romance. The show is set to Sedaka's best-known songs including Where The Boys Are, Happy Birthday Sweet 16, Laughter In The Rain and the title song that moves the story. The musical is on the second year of a North American tour.

Sedaka recorded his songs as part of the Brill Building music experience in the 1950s when he was hired as a songwriter in the same era that produced Carol King and Neil Diamond, among others. As a youth, Sedaka played classical music on the piano and was awarded a Juilliard scholarship at age 13.

"I always had the love of other genres, but back in the late '50s, I was hired for these songs. Together with Howard Greenfield, we wrote wonderful romantic songs that endured," Sedaka said.

The duo sold more than 25 million records, but in the early 1960s, baby boomers preferred the protest songs of Peter, Paul and Mary and the rock 'n' roll music of The Beatles to anything that Sedaka wrote.

Sedaka and his wife, Leba, and their two children moved to England, where they had a reversal of fortune with some of his more mature songwriting. Sedaka expanded the theme of love found to include the themes of love lost and love reclaimed in his songs.

Although Sedaka found success by the 1970s with more heartfelt songs for other artists (such as Love Will Keep Us Together for Captain and Tennille), he was in vogue as the singer in Laughter In The Rain, as well as in the duet with daughter, Dara, in Should Have Never Let You Go, in 1980.

When Sedaka performed in Toronto earlier this year, he used the last half of his show to play the best of the classical music he knew as a child on the piano and songs he recorded from the Yiddish Theatre that drew raves.

"I love all these genres and appreciate that people love hearing all this – the Yiddish Theatre from songs my mother taught me and classical music – because it shows such respect for all I grew up with and all I loved from my family."

Sedaka's legacy includes being inducted into the Songwriters Hall of Fame, a feature on the A&E Biography series, and knowing that his peers, including singer/songwriters Neil Diamond and Barry Manilow, appreciated his work over his 60-year career.

Sedaka's marriage and family life have never faltered. He and Leba, both Sephardi Jews, met in New York and found love at home and in business. (Leba is Sedaka's mananger), which has kept their marriage together for 42 years. The Sedakas are also proud grandparents of twin girls, now five years old.

Neil Sedaka

Sedaka has no plans to retire and still tours across North America and England.

"I have been fortunate to have taken care of my voice for so long. I enjoy my family, so the tours are not every weekend like they used to be."

Breaking Up Is Hard To Do is at Stage West Dinner Theatre, 5400 Dixie Rd., Mississauga. Tickets are $42.99-$79.99 For further information, call 905-238-0042 or go to www.stagewest.com.

MWFF '09 to feature a record 240 flicks

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The Aug. 27-Sept. 7 Montreal World Film Festival is luring cinephiles with a record 240 feature movies from 78 countries, more than half of them world premieres.

While at writing it wasn't yet known how many of the features or documentaries contain Jewish content, in terms of theme or plot, it did appear that Israel would only have one flick at the fest.

That would be director Jorge Gurvich's Mrs. Moskowitz and the Cats, starring Rita Zohar.

Lainie Kazan is one of the stars of Oy Vey!My Son is Gay! at Montreal World Film Festival

The movie is about a lonely widow in a rehab centre, and Zohar's performance won her the Wolgin Award for best actress at the Jerusalem Film Festival. She's also nominated for best actress honours in Israel's version of the Oscars, the Ophirs.

One film that seems guaranteed to garner attention is Oy Vey! My Son is Gay!, which is competing in the festival's inaugural First Films World Competition.

Described as a "gay-themed family comedy," Oy Vey! is said to have taken seven years to reach the screen. The story is about a Jewish family on Long Island whose parents want him to meet a nice Jewish girl – but guess what?

Stars include Lainie Kazan and Saul Rubinek, and the producer/director is Russian-born Israeli Evgeny Afineevsky, who has already made a name for himself as one of Israel's top impresarios.

The film categories – world competition, world greats, focus on world cinema, documentaries of the world, student film and video festival – also remain the same.

Individual tickets are $10, while a booklet of 10 coupons is $60.

The festival is also offering a limited number of $80 passports, which give you admission to as many films as you want, but a special form must be e-mailed or faxed in by Aug. 22.

The festival's main phone number is 514-848-3883, and its website address is www.ffm-montreal.org.

Edwardo impersonates entertainers from the Ed Sullivan era

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

From Borat to Frank Sinatra to Homer Simpson to Kermit the Frog, there is no impersonation too challenging for The Amazing Edwardo.

Known off-stage as Edward Fine, this Toronto entertainer has found his calling in creating his own Jewish cabaret theatre.

"This is the world's greatest Jewish variety show," said Fine, who is solely responsible for every aspect of his production. The hosting, singing, dancing, magic, juggling, sound, lighting, costumes and props are his specialties, and he does all of it for free.

"I do not receive any money, and the 'performers' are volunteers. This is truly a not-for-profit show," he said. "My greatest gain is the gratitude of thanks I receive from my audience members."

The Amazing Edwardo as Neil Diamond

After many years of brainstorming ideas, Fine's first show was held at Originals Restaurant in Toronto in October 2006, where everyone dressed up in their favourite costume for his Jewish Halloween theme. The event marked the beginning of Fine's efforts to share his talents with the public and "create new and exciting styles of entertainment," he said.

Aside from wanting to "amaze" his crowd, The Amazing Edwardo developed his act to unite the local adult Jewish community in a fun and relaxed environment. He said he realized there are thousands of Jewish singles in the Greater Toronto Area who are not members of any social organization.

"Where do they go to meet other Jews? The only type of Jewish singles events are usually located downtown, in a nightclub, with very loud music that the DJ decides to play. There is nothing Jewish about these events. And it's so loud you can't even talk to anyone," Fine said.

His act, which is modelled after the Ed Sullivan Show, is Fine's attempt to recapture the Jewish entertainment from the 1940s, '50s and '60s, and to make it educational as well.

"If my goal is to invite Jewish people to my events, then I want Jewish entertainment. This may be the world's only Jewish cabaret theatre," Fine said.

While the Ed Sullivan Show introduced its viewers to famous performers such as the Beatles, Elvis and Tom Jones, Fine said his production is a tribute to those greats. He can do almost 50 impersonations, with Jackie Mason and Neil Diamond being two of his favourites.

Fine said he encourages audience participation and "makes everyone feel like they are a TV star." One of his biggest thrills is watching normally shy people come up on stage and break out of their shells. His June 2008 show at What A Bagel restaurant in Thornhill was three hours long, due to an overwhelming audience response.

In order to attract attention to his theatre, Fine said he has spent hundreds of hours promoting his show. He has sent e-mails to various celebrities throughout the world, telling them about his cabaret act and has used their letters of response for publicity.

Fine has performed for many years at the Governor General's annual garden party in Ottawa, with thousands in attendance. He was also a featured performer at several Canada Day festivities in Ottawa, which were broadcast live by CBC-TV.

Fine said he keeps fans up-to-date through a mailing list that is constantly growing. Subscribers receive a full-colour poster about his upcoming events. He puts video clips of the highlights of his shows on YouTube, at www.youtube.com/casinorama.

Volunteer learns about the 'Jewish experience' in Buenos Aires

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Matthew Cohen is one of many youths who took part in a Ve'ahavta program to assist the Jewish community in Buenos Aires this past May.

Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee is a non-profit Toronto-based organization that funds humanitarian aid and relief projects worldwide. Launched in 1996, its mission is to spread the message of "tikkun olam"– or "repairing the world"– to all corners of the globe.

Cohen, 19, is a graduate of Crestwood Preparatory College in Toronto and has just finished his first year at the University of Western Ontario, where he's majoring in political science. He heard about the opportunity to volunteer abroad through a friend whose father is on the board of directors at Ve'ahavta, and he knew immediately that it was something he wanted to be a part of. "Right away I was drawn to it. I mean, I didn't really have any summer plans, besides getting a summer job, but I wanted to travel," he said.

"Doing Birthright [Israel] was an idea, but that never happened. So, right when I heard about [Ve'ahavta], that stood out as the thing that I wanted to do, because it's such a great experience to be able to travel and see the world on your own, and at the same time help out and do something good for a community that needs it."

Buenos Aires is home to the world's largest Latin Jewish community, with about 190,000 Jews. About 25,000 to 50,000 Jews live in the provincial cities of Cordova, Tucuman and Rosario. But these numbers have been dwindling over the years, with many Argentine Jews immigrating to other countries due to a plethora of social and political problems faced by the country, including rising poverty and crime rates, as well as rampant anti-Semitism.

Ve'ahavta has been providing food, clothing, shelter, medicine and subsidies for the community in Argentina and offers programs for volunteers in Argentina. Ve'ahavta has also been spreading awareness of the situation there to more fortunate Jews in North America.

Cohen, who went to Buenos Aires with two friends from university, said the five-week program began with orientation, which included touring the city, and taking Spanish classes.

For the next few weeks, Cohen helped out at a daycare at a Jewish community centre – something he used to do at home when he looked after children at his synagogue – Toronto's Temple Emanu-El – on High Holidays and Friday nights – and taught English to university students at the local Hillel, where he says they would "hold conversation classes."

Cohen said that one of his most memorable experiences came when the group travelled to the slums outside the city limits to help other volunteers build houses for 100 families in need in just three days.

"We were lucky enough to be a part of the project, and it was definitely one of the highlights of the trip," he said.

He and his group spent three nights sleeping in a school with about 100 Argentines their own age.

"We got to know all the people there," he said.

"[We would] have conversations about what our life was like in Toronto, our university experience and everything like that. And that was really cool. We saw them again a week afterward in the city. There was a big party, and we hung out with all of them.

"I still talk to some of them on Facebook and MSN."

When he wasn't volunteering, he had some free time to explore the city, and even attended a couple of soccer games.

"[The work] wasn't overwhelming, but we had stuff to do every day in terms of volunteering, and then we had one weekend where we were off for two nights," he said.

"We had time to go out on our own and explore [the city] ourselves, which was nice. It was a lot of connecting with people our own age and sort of understanding what the Jewish experience is like in Buenos Aires and allowing our Jewish experience to rub off on them."

Cohen said his time in Buenos Aires has enabled him to connect with his Jewish roots by providing him with an alternative perspective on Jewish communities around the world.

"A lot of them, I think, maybe aren't fearful, but maybe just aren't comfortable with their Judaism," he said.

"I think it allowed me to see how Jews live in other parts of the world, like what Judaism means to them and how [their customs] differ from ours." For more information about Ve'ahavta, visit www.veahavta.org.

Ben Cowley, left, and Matt Cohen spent three days building homes for needy families in the outskirts of Buenos Aires.

CHAT grad pens guide to American Jewish fiction

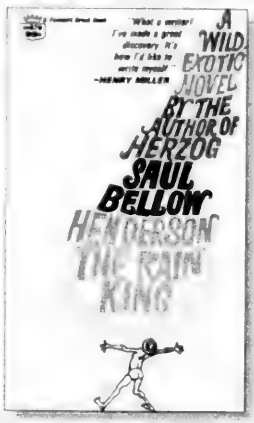
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The esteemed Jewish Publication Society of Philadelphia has just published a new literary guidebook titled American Jewish Fiction that is a delight to browse, genuinely thought-provoking to read, and also happens to bring immense credit to one of our own.

The author is Josh Lambert, who was born and raised in Toronto, where he graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT); he completed his studies at Harvard and the University of Michigan, achieving a PhD in English literature. A reviewer of Jewish fiction for the Forward, the Globe and Mail and other publications, he's preparing to begin work next month as a Dorot assistant professor in the department of Hebrew and Judaic studies at New York University.

For me, the joy of browsing American Jewish Fiction began the moment I turned to the contents page – or rather, pages. Nine pages are devoted to listing the 125 books that Lambert has chosen to include. The chronological list begins with Differences, an obscure 1867 novel by Nathan Meyer, and concludes with Petropolis, an equally obscure (for me) novel by Anya Ulinich, published in 2007.

Between these two bookends, so to speak, lies 140 years of Jewish literature produced in the United States. Naturally, the book includes all the expected literary greats – Abraham Cahan, Sholem Aleichem, Anzia Yezierska, Henry Roth, Sholem Asch, Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Isaac Bashevis Singer, Philip Roth, Cynthia Ozick, Nathan Englander, Jonathan Safran Foer. The delight is that there is also a generous measure of popular "low-brow" authors, as well as little-known authors and works that the guide, with its widely set parameters, brings to our attention.

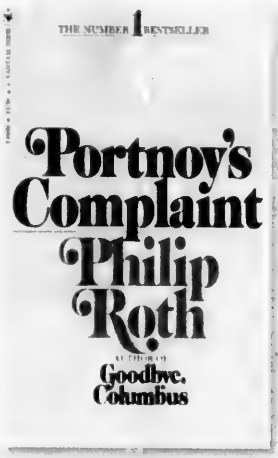


Who knew that Vera Caspary, creator of the bestselling noir detective story Laura, also penned the 1932 tale Thicker Than Water, about "a proud Jewess of noble Portuguese descent" in Chicago? Or that the luminescent literary critic Leslie Fiedler wrote a 1966 novel, The Last Jew in America? Here, also, are intelligent discussions of diverse popular works such as Jerome Weidman's I Can Get It For You Wholesale (1937), Irving Shulman's The Amboy Dukes (1947), Harold Robbins' A Stone for Danny Fisher (1952), Herman Wouk's Marjorie Morningstar (1955) and Meyer Levin's Compulsion (1956).

Just like that old advertising campaign that asserts you don't have to be Jewish to enjoy a good bagel, the book also includes Bech, A Book (1970). Its author, John Updike, along with Truman Capote and other non-Jewish American writers of the late 1960s, discerned that they suffered a disadvantage because the literary marketplace seemed to favour works of Jewish provenance. Updike's solution, Lambert writes, was to create "a durable alter ego… a curmudgeonly American Jewish writer named Henry Bech."

As A Driven Leaf, Milton Steinberg's 1939 novel of ancient Israel, is included simply because it is such an extraordinary novel and perhaps the best in its class, Lambert explains, adding that other works set outside of America were excluded for lack of space. Regrettably, works by Mordecai Richler, David Bezmozgis and other Canadian scribes are by definition excluded from primary treatment, although they may show up en passant in discussions of other writers

For each entry, Lambert provides a capsule description, thematic analysis, a few sparkling insights, and perhaps the occasional explanation regarding the selection. Franz Kafka's Amerika, for example, was penned in 1927 by an author who never set foot in America. Further, Kafka's depiction of the great land was riddled with errors, beginning in the first paragraph when he asserts that it is a sword – not the torch of liberty – that the Statue of Liberty holds aloft in New York harbour.



Like a Rorschach drawing, the American setting gave Kafka the opportunity "to spin out his characteristic fantasies and nightmares: endless hallways, Sisyphean labors, grotesque characters, grim jokes," Lambert observes. "Kafka's America, like ours – and perhaps a little like the travelogues upon which he based his work – is a place of both opportunity and danger, surreal possibility and vague threat."

The recently deceased Budd Schulberg is remembered for his 1941 best-selling novel What Makes Sammy Run?, about a poor Jewish teen from New York who claws and hustles his way to the top of the Hollywood film industry.

An even more repugnant portrait of a Jewish protagonist is presented in Haunch, Paunch and Jowl, a lesser-known 1923 novel by Samuel Ornitz. Lambert addresses the difficulty head on:

"One of the literary debates that never seems to get resolved is whether a book that depicts a Jewish character as scheming, criminal, or downright evil is automatically anti-Semitic. We don't hold literature about non-Jews to that same standard, of course; Shakespeare's Macbeth tells the tale of a couple of repulsive social climbers, but rarely is it thought of, nowadays at least, as propaganda against the Scots." While Ornitz's book has often been castigated as anti-Semitic, he continues, the book "is more complex than such a knee-jerk reaction suggests."

In all of his selections, Lambert attempts to revise the commonly held but (he convincingly argues) faulty critical notion that American Jewish fiction was a negligible commodity until it had a "breakthrough" moment in the 1950s, when it exploded into the mainstream. "In 1918, when a rabbi in Cincinnati published a bibliography of English-language fiction about Jewish life in the United States, some 70 novel and short story collections already fit the bill," he writes. "Then, instead of slowing down, Jewish literary production boomed in the 1920s, as Jews took on pivotal roles in the world of New York publishing."

Major themes discussed include the classic plotlines of immigration as well as assimilation and intermarriage. The book explores the notion, prevalent in a large number of works, that America is like a "shiksa," the Gentile woman whom one loves but cannot marry, except at the risk of losing one's Jewish soul.

Other entries deal with Delmore Schwartz, E. L. Doctorow, Dara Horn, the graphic novelist Ben Katchor, Tova Mirvis, Michael Chabon, Nora Ephron, Leon Uris, Myla Goldberg, Allegra Goodman, Erica Jong, Arthur Miller – and still many more again. At 206 pages, this guide, like its subject matter, is large and contains multitudes. It is sure to please lovers of Jewish fiction everywhere.

The authors of the books pictured here, and many others, are discussed in American Jewish Fiction, an insightful critical guide by former Torontonian Josh Lambert.

Garbage mountain is transforming into a paradise

By NATI WISE
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — One of the greatest achievements for the green movement in Israel in the past few years was the government decision in 2005 to create Park Ariel Sharon, whose namesake lobbied vigorously for its establishment

The park was originally named Park Ayalon, and it covers a vast 2,000-acre area that borders the southern entrance to Tel Aviv and the city's southern satellite cities. By comparison, Central Park in New York City is around 900 acres.

The dominant landscape feature of Park Ariel Sharon is the inactive Hiriya landfill, which towers more than 80 metres above sea level, and is 400 metres wide and one kilometre long. It provides breathtaking views of Tel Aviv to the west and the Judean Hills to the east.

The Hiriya landfill closed in 1998, but a waste transfer station still operates at the site, where trucks bring most of central Israel's waste before it reaches the Negev Desert in the south.

With the decision to create Park Ariel Sharon came pitched legal battles between the Israeli green movement and parties with real estate interests in the land who didn't want to see the entire area designated as parkland, because it would come at the expense of their plans to build thousands of housing units.

Israeli environmentalists were elated when the National Planning Board decided in 2007 that the entire area proposed for the park would be designated exclusively as parkland. The Park Ariel Sharon Company is the government body created to oversee the park's creation.

To celebrate the future park in grand style, in the presence of the current Environment Minister Gilad Erdan, members of former prime minister Ariel Sharon's family and many other park well-wishers, the Hiriya garbage mound was illuminated by electric lights for the first time on July 19, with the power coming from gas derived from recycled trash.

The garbage mountain will be lit up every night and will stand, say environmentalists, as a constant reminder of wrongs done to the environment in the past, how the harm caused can be alleviated and how Israel's relationship to the environment can be improved.

With the main bureaucratic hurdles for the establishment of the park now out of the way, what remains is the transformation of the empty fields and the Hiriya landfill into a natural oasis in the middle of the Tel Aviv metropolis.

The German architect Peter Latz won the competition to design Park Ariel Sharon. Latz's plan is to rehabilitate the Hiriya landfill by covering the garbage mountain with native plant species and trails. But bringing the park from the drawing board to reality will require hundreds of millions of dollars and years of dedication from both Israelis and Jews around the world.

Martin Weyl is the visionary who pioneered the idea of the park and the preservation of the Hiriya garbage mound.

A former curator and director of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem, Weyl said that it "will take around 55 million U.S. dollars to rehabilitate the Hiriya garbage dump and around 155 million to develop the entire park, so there is a long road ahead to see the park to completion.

"But the great interest in it and the energy that has gone into it until now has created momentum that will result in the park's ultimate realization, and this is very exciting."

Most of the funding for the initial development of the park have come from the Beracha Foundation, an Israeli charitable foundation.

The Israeli government has so far matched the funds donated by the Beracha Foundation so that enough money – $17 million – is now available to the Park Ariel Sharon Company to rehabilitate one-third of the garbage mountain. Phase 1 of the endeavor is underway and is scheduled to be completed in two years.

Although the park will take decades to complete, it's currently open to visitors and is an interesting off-the-beaten-track destination for tourists.

At the base of the Hiriya garbage mound, there's a large visitors centre displaying a model of Latz's winning design for the park. A designer in residence at the visitors centre finds items from the waste transfer station and creates stylish household items from them.

The visitors centre has become an important site for environmental education in Israel, and elementary school students comprise most of the 50,000 visitors that have visited so far this year. The Park Ariel Sharon Company expects 100,000 people to visit next year.

The park's website www.ayalon-park.org.il provides contact and other information in English.

Israeli competes in World Canoe Championships

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

DARTMOUTH, N.S. — Eran Leb faced a challenge.

The 21-year-old Israeli kayaker from Kibbutz Ein Gev in the Jordan Valley looked across the start line last Thursday for his 1000-metre K1 heat at the World Canoe Championships in Dartmouth, N.S. He saw Olympic champion Adam Van Koeverden from Canada in the next lane and Russian champion Anton Ryahov among the other contestants.

After practice two days earlier, Leb was asked if he'd be satisfied with third in his heat. He smiled. "First would be fine."

A seventh-place finish with a time of 3:52.3, behind heat winner Adam Van Koeverden (3:36.1) of Canada and runner-up Anton Ryahov of Russia, still qualified him for the semifinal Friday, when Leb finished eighth (3:47.1) and missed the A final.

Later Thursday, Leb finished in seventh, and was eliminated, in the K1 500-metre. His time of 1:57.6 was 10 seconds back of heat winner Van Koeverden.

More than 1,000 athletes coaches and officials from 70 countries took part in the four-day event. Leb was Israel's lone athlete.

It was his first world senior event. He's competed at worlds before, but at the junior level. The Israeli team's chef-de-mission, Moshe Yizhak of Kfar Tvol, said that Leb, at 21, is several years from his peak.

"Most world-class senior paddlers and kayakers are 28 and above," he said. "This will be a good experience for Eran."

Leb was the Israel team in Dartmouth. He's been kayaking for 11 years and has attended three junior world championships and the last two Europeans as well. His older brother was a paddler. That built Leb's enthusiasm.

"I live on Lake Kinneret [a paddling hotbed, with two of three paddling clubs in Israel located there]," Leb said. "The opportunity is there for me."

Yizhak noted that Israel had several fine paddlers who have now aged and turned to coaching and outside work. Included is Michael Kolganov who won a K1 500-metre bronze medal in 2000 in the Sydney Olympics, the first-ever Olympic medal for the Israeli Canoe Federation and Israel's only medal that year. Kolganov won gold in the K1 200-metre at the worlds two years earlier in Hungary.

Leb's goal was to get to the nine-person B final, but he didn't qualify. The world's best battled for gold in the A final. The third-tier kayakers qualified for the C final.

"If he can be in the middle of the pack, that will be very good for Eran," Yizhak said.

After practising on a damp, cool morning, Leb said his best time in the 1000 K1 (single kayaker in the boat) is about 3:40. The top athletes go below 3:30. He has reached 1:44 in the 500 K1 while the best finish is under 1:37.

Yizhak was pleased with Leb's work.

"It's cold here, though," he said about the 18 degree-Celsius temperatures. "Right now in Israel, it's in the 40s. Eran's [two-a-day] training regimen has slowed down, so he'll be fresh when the competition begins."

Leb will complete his three years of army service in October. Yizhak said he has been able to train morning and night and do six hours of army work in the middle of the day.

"They have a special program for elite athletes," he said. "It's hard to qualify for that posting [in the army]."

The Israeli contingent stayed in a Dalhousie University residence. Leb and Yizhak attended Shabbat evening services at nearby Beth Israel Synagogue. On Saturday, while Leb trained, Yizhak returned to shul.

"It was enjoyable," Yizhak said. "The young rabbi is from Israel, and we had a great discussion. They even invited me to Kiddush," he added with a smile.

He said the atmosphere at the competition lake was friendly. "The people are nice. There are lots of very patient volunteers."

Hoopster leaves high school to turn pro in Israel

JTA

NEW YORK — An American high schooler signed a contract to play professionally for an Israeli basketball team next season.

Jeremy Tyler last week became the first U.S. basketball player to turn pro by playing for a team overseas before graduating from high school, according to reports.

The 18-year-old from San Diego will play for the Maccabi Haifa Heat and reportedly will earn an annual salary of $140,000 (US).

"I think I made the right decision," he was quoted by Associated Press as saying last week. "I think this team is a good fit for me, and it's the right country."

Tyler, a native of San Diego, is expected to begin training camp in Haifa at the end of the month.

The 6-foot-11, 260-pound Tyler announced in the spring that he was skipping his last season at San Diego High School because the basketball had become "boring."

A representative for Tyler told The CJN last week that his client chose Israel over "four or five" other European team offers, not because of any religious motivation, but because he felt "most comfortable" playing in a country where he could speak English in addition to being part of a team owned by a fellow American.

Tyler averaged 28.7 points in his junior year at San Diego High, leading his team to the CIF-San Diego Section Division I quarterfinals. He is expected to return to the United States when he becomes eligible for the 2011 NBA draft, where some see him as a top pick, according to a statement from Triangle Financial Services, a Florida-based sports and entertainment investment firm that recently purchased Maccabi Haifa.

Triangle's chairman, U.S. businessman Jeffrey Rosen, has invested large sums of money to turn the franchise into a powerhouse and challenge Maccabi Tel Aviv's dominance.

Keeping those fires burning

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

"We're taking a romantic vacation!" I said to Meir as we ate fast food at the mall.

"How romantic can it be?" asked my beloved as he wiped our daughter's nose tiredly

"No kids. That's how romantic," I reply

So, with the kids safe and sound at a friend's place for the weekend, we headed to that amazing rented house by the lake

See, we've been here almost two years and never really explored the romantic side of Canada.

I thought it would be good for us

Face it. On an average day, Meir gets to see me in the morning wearing my old pyjamas, no makeup and with "life of its own" hair. Then he gets to see me fighting with the kids, and late at night, if he really wants to (and why would he?) he sees me flat on the couch, gazing at the TV with my tongue hanging out

So, after buying a lot of food, wine, sensual oils, candles and bath foams, we hit the road, and I tried hard to enjoy it.

It didn't bother me a bit that Meir refused to ask for directions. We drove for five hours, and I said nothing. Thank God we found the cabin.

When we arrived, there was still time for a picnic. Our Canada is so beautiful, and we're nature people, so we decided to go for a hike. After a long time walking (at least four minutes), I got tired and hungry.

"You've tricked me again!" Meir complained. "Just like at Niagara Falls. I wanted to absorb the Falls, while you wanted to absorb the nearest buffet!"

As we ate fresh bread and cheeses, I couldn't help but feel that Meir was mad at me. He also said things like, "I want to explore the area. I want to walk."

Oh well

I said nothing when I discovered he bought red wine, when we all know that you have to have white with cheese. I hate him just a little for that, but it doesn't really matter anyway, since a certain someone also forgot to bring the corkscrew!

We returned to the cabin silently, and Meir started filling up the bathtub.

Uneducated in the ways of sensual bathing, he poured in the whole bottle of expensive bath salts. I was furious.

I started lighting the sensual candles when all of a sudden my husband started choking and coughing terribly. Even though I was tempted not to, I blew out the candles. It turned out he's allergic to patchouli. Who knew?

After he calmed down, he tried to prepare the barbecue. Naturally, he wasn't able to light the fire (any fire!) and I had to come to the rescue. The problem was, we forgot all about the bath. We had to call the neighbours – a a nice couple who came with five kids – to help us with the flood.

In the morning, although we were tired – the mosquitoes, it seems, needed very little sleep, and the five kids next door needed even less – we had already booked a boat, so we needed to set sail.

But who would have thought that it could rain so much in August?

So we waved our rented boat goodbye and got into our car.

I'm not going tell you how many hours we spent on the road, but I will tell you that returning to my loud city, messy house and fighting kids made me feel so appreciated that I immediately found myself in a romantic mood.

Osteoporosis is manageable

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

We all know what osteoporosis is, and we all know someone who has it, but did you know that osteoporosis can kill you?

Recently, a Canadian study stated that Canadians with osteoporosis have a very high risk of an early death. One in four people who break a hip and one in six who suffer a spinal fracture will die within five years. One in two women over 60 are diagnosed with the disease, and one in two women over 50 will experience an osteoporosis fracture in her lifetime.

Some risk factors for the disease are unavoidable, such as heredity and decreased hormone levels. But lifestyle habits such as stress, smoking, lack of physical activity and inadequate levels of calcium and vitamin D are all risk factors you can control. The best medicine for osteoporosis is prevention and early detection.

Everyone over 50 should have a bone density test. It's easy and painless, and it's the only way to know the true health of your bones. Osteoporosis is an internal disease that isn't obvious from the outside. Most people don't know they have it until they fall and fracture a bone, but did you know there are signs of osteoporosis that are commonly overlooked, such as early height loss, certain kinds of back pain or a curvature of the upper spine (known as Dowager's hump).

Prevention is the key. By building better bones with a healthy diet rich in calcium and vitamin D, and with exercise, you can make a positive difference on your own health. By exercising with resistance or weights of any kind, you're helping your body produce a chemical reaction that leads your body to produce bone and deposit it all over the body.

When looking for a cardiovascular exercise for your bones, walking outside is best – the impact on the ground causes the same chemical reaction as free weights. And if you don't know how to use weights or resistance-based equipment and want to start, hire someone to show you how. Your bones will thank you for it.

Anti-Semitism: the coast is clear

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I feel sorry for us, the Jewish People. I feel this way because we know the world is sitting on a powder keg of hatred, and in our particular case, anti-Semitism, and we are not readying ourselves for it.

I harbour a great sense of melancholy for the Children of Israel. If we were a rotten bunch intent upon hurling the other kids off the hill, or were conspirators in a Zionist plot to take over the banking sector, then maybe the animosity would be understandable. But we are not. We are a nation entrenched in the belief that we are creations of God who exist to make our world better. We thirst and hunger for peace.

We are good folk and hated – a tragic mix.

I am deeply worried for us because it is so clear that we do not take full responsibility for our own future. I am troubled because we are not doing everything we can to make sure our children, our seniors, our Israeli brothers and sisters, and we in the Diaspora, are safe.

While there are many efforts going on both in Canada and across the world to fight anti-Semitism, they are not enough. Yes, in our fine country, B'nai Brith, Friends of Simon Weisenthal Center, Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish federations, UJA and others are battling anti-Semitism, but mostly at a policy level and always through a handful of people. This will not accomplish what needs to be done.

These organizations are trying, but their success will be limited – because anti-Semitism lurks in the streets, laneways and basements of Scarborough, Rosedale, Saskatoon and Quebec, places the short arms of these entities cannot reach.

The war we are struggling with today is against fundamentalism. Within that world, be it Christian or Muslim, you will find believers in suicide who will hurt our people because "God said it's the right thing to do."

This way of thinking creates angry, and often sociopathic behaviour. Just look at the eyes of the Taliban leaders. They are fiery blazes of wrath. They have troops aplenty who are peering from behind doorposts at you and me.

While anti-Semitism gains momentum from the top down, it is on the ground that the real putsches have taken place throughout history. We are failing in the fight against anti-Semitism from the bottom up.

My Jewish brothers and sisters, what is needed – and this must come from you – is an international investment in an arm of the Jewish world overseen by a broad spectrum of Israeli and Diaspora leadership, financed by our philanthropists, with an unlimited budget, whose mission statement is solely to involve every Jew and good human being, at every level, in the fight against anti-Semitism and hatred of all types, and to befriend our friends.

This initiative must be free of Jewish organizational infighting and operate with the creativity of the Israel Defence Forces and the efficiency of the businesses our accomplished community members oversee.

You know Israel will be at war again. You know we will have to kill many of our enemies, and innocents will be standing in the way. You know the world will condemn us unceasingly. And you know anti-Semitism will once again explode over us.

If you know this, why aren't you doing anything?

Congregants, tell your rabbis; rabbis, tell our organizational leaders; leaders, build this international protective shield. Do so in the memory of our beloved felled by anti-Semitism. Do so for my child and yours. We absolutely must try harder.

Israel to add more envoys to Canadian diplomatic corps

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Two new Israeli envoys will arrive in Canada over the next year to supplement its corps of diplomats here.

That's one more than any other country will receive, including the United States.

Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv hailed this as a "positive" step for ties between the two countries, both diplomatic and cultural.

"It proves the importance the Israeli foreign ministry places on our relations with Canada. The bigger staff will enable us to do more," Ziv told The CJN last week from her office at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa.

The embassy will receive a new staff member by next summer, while the consulate in Toronto will get a new deputy consul by year's end.

"Canada is a big country, and our work entails not only working in our own cities, but travelling and meeting with government officials and Jewish communities all over Canada," Ziv said. "So the additional staff will allow both the [Toronto] consulate and our embassy to do more and expand on what we have been doing so far in Canada."

Miriam Ziv

Amir Gissin

Though pleased by the news, Ziv was not surprised that Canada received the nod for two new diplomats, explaining that Israel's foreign ministry must have recognized the "very active" nature of the Toronto consulate, because of the city's large Israeli population. Beyond that, the Toronto consulate is also tasked with seeing to the needs of its clients in the western provinces.

The added staff in Canada is something its Jewish and Israeli communities should recognize as a rare privilege as well as being a response to the emerging position of Toronto as a global focal point for both pro and anti-Israel activity, said Amir Gissin, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada.

"There is a feeling [from both pro- and anti-Israel advocates] that Toronto has become more important and attracted more attention in recent years. And Israel's struggle here is putting much more attention on us. Everybody's watching Toronto more than before – the world and all those engaged with Israel's image," he said. "This puts more responsibility on those who love Israel and want to support her."

Multiculturalism in Israel

Women from Nepal who are in Israel as immigrants or as foreign workers celebrate the three-day Teej festival in the Neveh Sha'anan neighbourhood of Tel Aviv. Nepalese tradition requires most women to celebrate the holiday, which includes feasting on the first day, fasting on the second day and holy bathing on the third day. The festival is aimed at helping women achieve happiness in marriage.

No Swastika Tattoo

NOVGOROD — A Russian court fined a man for having a swastika tattoo and ordered it removed. According to the Union of Councils for Jews in the Former Soviet Union (UCSJ), in ordering the removal, the Novgorod court cited a rarely applied law that prohibits the public display of Nazi symbols. The fine of 1,000 rubles is equal to about $32. The judge justified the decision by pointing out in the verdict that the tattoo is on the defendant's right hand and therefore is "visible to people around him."

AMIA Attack

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's president attended the annual commemoration of the terrorist attack on the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. Postponed by national measures to prevent the spread of swine flu, the commemoration of the 15th anniversary of the worst terrorist attack ever in Argentina was held a month after the actual anniversary date of July 18. Attending for the first time as the Argentine president, Cristina Fernandez participated in a moment of silence during the tribute. Thousands of Argentines gathered at Pasteur Street, in front of the rebuilt AMIA, to call for justice with local politicians.

Israel Critic Dies

WASHINGTON — Robert Novak, the Jewish-born influential conservative columnist who often criticized Israel, has died at age 78. Novak died last week in Washington after a long struggle with brain cancer. Novak ran a running battle with pro-Israel groups, claiming they were unduly influential in Washington and that Israel was principally to blame for the exodus of Palestinian Christians.

Looking Out for a Jewish Hero

NEW YORK — United Jewish Communities/The Jewish Federations of North America has launched the first annual Jewish Community Hero Awards, which celebrate the selflessness and courage of individuals who are bettering their communities through service and outreach.

The initiative will honour one Jewish Community Hero of the Year, who will receive $25,000 to put toward his or her work, and also recognize four additional finalists. About 50 partner organizations are supporting the initiative, in addition to Jewish federations across North America.

Any individual or group can nominate a hero through an open, online submission process. After nominees are screened, their names are posted on the Jewish Community Heroes website http://jewishcommunityheroes.org, where people can vote for their favourite Jewish heroes.

UJC/The Jewish Federations of North America will honour the five nominees who receive the most votes at this fall's General Assembly in Washington, D.C., which takes place Nov. 8 to 10. A panel of judges will select the Jewish community hero from among the finalists.

Individual who are at least 13 years of age and residents of the United States or Canada are eligible to be nominees, provided their work affects a community in North America. Nominations and voting will be accepted through Oct. 8.

Pe'er puts Dubai discrimination behind her

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dubai may have said no to her, but Israeli tennis star Shahar Pe'er said yes to Toronto, choosing to appear at the Rogers Cup last week to get back in form and compete after being sidelined by injury.

For one week in February, Pe'er may have been better known for having been barred from play in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) than for her achievements on the tennis court. Pe'er became a victim of Middle East politics in her own sport when the UAE refused to give her a visa to enter the Dubai women's tournament because she held an Israeli passport.

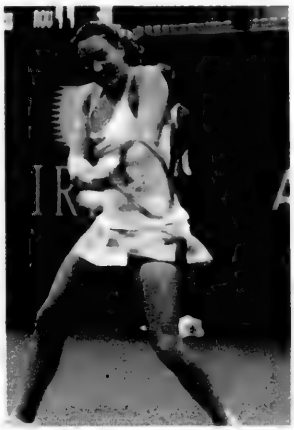
The 22-year-old Pe'er earned headlines around the world for becoming the first tennis player banned from a tournament for her nationality. Some of the biggest names in her sport – as well as Jewish organizations worldwide – unanimously condemned the ban. The American Tennis Channel boycotted the Dubai tournament, as did Andy Roddick in the Dubai men's tournament the following week, despite being defending champion.

"I didn't know it would be such a big deal over the media all over the world," Pe'er said last week in Toronto, where she competed at the recent $2-million Rogers Cup tournament at the Rexall Centre.

Pe'er chose the Rogers Cup as a replacement tournament because its status and purse are equal to those of Dubai.

"I was angry, upset, but happy with the settlement. Sports and politics should not mix, and it does not matter if a Jew, Muslim or anyone else enters, discrimination is wrong," she said. "But I want people to know me as a tennis player rather than for the politics in Dubai. I need to regain my form, as I missed the French Open and other tournaments when I had a stress fracture in my right foot."

Although the women players did not pull out of the Dubai event, the Women's Tennis Association fined the Dubai tournament $300,000 (US), awarded Pe'er financial and ranking compensation and mandated that Pe'er and other Israelis competing in the future would be guaranteed automatic entry into Dubai or the WTA would drop Dubai from the 2010 schedule.



Shahar Pe'er returns a volley at the Rogers Cup in Toronto last week.

UAE officials – realizing they had a PR nightmare – granted Israeli Andy Ram a direct entry into the Dubai men's tournament the following week.

Since her injury in late May that had Pe'er missing three tournaments and not advancing beyond her opening matches in her first two tournaments in July, Pe'er was eager to improve upon her current No. 68 ranking to get back to the form that had her ranked 15th in 2007.

Pe'er showed fans that she would be remembered in Toronto for her grit and aggressive play on the tennis court.

Pe'er finished her mandatory army duty in Israel a few years ago, and last week she played like a warrior, fighting for every point, winning fans over with her grinding display of backhands and forehands in her three matches.

Something very bad in Sweden

From the editor's desk...

Something very bad appears to be happening in Europe. An ancient, hatred – the vilification of Jews – the familiar, reliable, evocative icon of a millennial prejudice seems to have pushed its way once again into the parameters of civil discourse.

Anti-Semitism ended once and for all, we thought, we imagined, we hoped with the discovery of the unfathomable evil wrought by the Nazis during World War II.

We were wrong. Alas.

Reports of anti-Semitic incidents in Europe and in North America have become frequent reading fare. Just two weeks ago, Kenneth Jacobson, deputy national director of the Anti-Defamation League in the United States told a New Jersey audience that he sees an "explosion" of anti-Semitism around the world, centered in Europe and the Arab world."

As reported in the New Jersey Jewish News "Jacobson ticked off incident after incident, from boycotts of Israel in Europe to violence against Jews in France."

Jacobson said that during the three weeks of the Gaza War last winter he counted 113 violent incidents in France, including a Molotov cocktail being thrown into a synagogue and 220 anti-Semitic incidents in Great Britain.

The rise in anti-Semitism worldwide has been well-documented by the many dedicated monitoring agencies on behalf of Jewish communities around the world. No further elaboration is necessary here.

Many experts suggest that the waves of hostile behaviour towards Jews are propelled by Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. Most readers, unfortunately, are sufficiently experienced and sufficiently sophisticated to discern legitimate criticism of Israel from good, old-fashioned anti-Semitism. We rather believe the conflict is more pretext than cause of anti-Semitism.

The shocking episode last week involving Sweden's largest newspaper Aftonbladet is illustrative.

As reported in this week's issue of The CJN, an article appeared prominently in Aftonbladet claiming that Israeli soldiers killed Palestinians in order to harvest their organs. "They plunder the organs of our sons," read the headline in the two-page story.

Relying on unfounded, unproven, untested and unreliable Palestinian sources, the reporter, Donald Boström, drew a direct link with the IDF's alleged organ harvesting practices and the recent arrests in New Jersey of a ring of individuals that included many Jews who bought and sold human organs.

Not surprisingly, Israelis took great offence with the story. The Foreign Ministry reacted angrily to the report. Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor said the newspaper's decision to publish the story is "a mark of disgrace," calling it a "dark blood libel out of the Middle Ages."

Sweden's ambassador to Israel, Elisabet Borsiin Bonnier agreed. She quickly condemned Boström's calumny in a statement she posted on the embassy's website. She described the offending article "as shocking and appalling to us Swedes as it is to Israeli citizens. We share the dismay expressed by Israeli government representatives, media and the Israeli public. This embassy cannot but clearly distance itself from it," the ambassador wrote. "Just as in Israel, freedom of the press prevails in Sweden," Bonnier said. She added, however, that "freedom of the press and freedom of expression...carry a certain responsibility."

Unbelievably, Ambassador Bonnier's response itself evoked an outcry of extreme umbrage and outrage from much of the Swedish establishment

The editor of Aftonbladet, Jan Helin, excoriated Bonnier, calling her denunciation of Boström's article an infringement on freedom of the press. In a signed editorial, Helin stood by his reporter and his dubious reporting. And then, he wrote: "It's deeply unpleasant and sad to see such a strong propaganda machine [Israel and the Jews] using centuries-old anti-Semitic images in an apparent attempt to get an obviously topical issue off the table."

In the wake of the Aftonbladet's editor's response, the Swedish government disavowed its own ambassador's statement. "The condemnation was solely the judgment of the embassy [in Tel Aviv], and designed for an Israeli audience." (My emphasis).

The editor's response was a red herring. No one complained about the right of the reporter to write his fiction. The complaint was about properly responding to that fiction.

The Swedish government's response was disgusting. As of this writing, the Foreign Minister of Israel is seeking an official condemnation or repudiation of sorts of the content of Boström's article. Israel's Defence Minister is mulling whether to seek damages for defamation on behalf of the IDF.

The sordid Aftonbladet episode has some of the ingredients of the anti-Semite's classic engagement with the world:

Calumny. A vile, vicious lie is propagated, intended to rouse emotions against the Jews, in this case the Jewish state. What can rouse emotions faster than a blood libel? Palestinians are killed in order to sell their body parts!

Conspiracy. The Jews conspire with each other in a world wide network of deception and dishonesty. Hence the reporter tied the allegations against the IDF to the indictments in New Jersey.

Something very bad is happening in Sweden. It is an Elul shofar blast calling us to awaken, to arise from our complacency.

Jews must respond without fear.

Israeli scientist takes charge at innovation centre

Hofstein translates scientific research into profits

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Raphael (Rafi) Hofstein is from MaRS, but he is anything but an alien.

An Israeli-born and bred scientist with a PhD in life sciences and chemistry, Hofstein was recently named president and chief executive officer of MaRS Innovation, a Toronto non-profit centre whose mandate is to connect science, business and capital, and foster collaboration among them.

Founded last year with a $14.9-million grant from the federal government and $10 million worth of matching funds from its partners, including the University of Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest, MaRS is an acronym without a particular meaning.

Its objective, though, is laser clear: to advance the commercialization of scientific research, or intellectual property, through industry partnerships, licensing agreements and the creation of companies.

"In the end, we want to start a whole new bio-tech industry in Toronto, an economy based on innovation" said Hofstein, a graduate of the Weizmann Institute of Science and the Hebrew University, and a former postdoctoral fellow at Harvard University's Medical School.

Hofstein, 60, works in an elegantly renovated building near the corner of College Street and University Avenue that once housed the Toronto General Hospital, and was previously president and CEO of Hadasit Ltd., the technology transfer company of the Hadassah Medical Organization in Jerusalem.

He is an expert in identifying "exciting" scientific discoveries and transforming them into commercially viable and profitable business ventures.

At Hadasit, where he worked for a decade before being hired by MaRS, he made close to 50 such discoveries. A few panned out, having passed rigorous clinical trials, and earned "many millions of dollars" for Hadassah.

Discussing one such discovery, he mentioned a breakthrough in which scientists found a way to convert embryonic stem cells into cells that are missing in people with Parkinson's disease, multiple sclerosis and age-related macular degeneration (AMD), an eye disease that causes blindness in older adults.

If all goes well, he said in an interview, the revolutionary technique will, within five or six years, offer a cure to people plagued by these diseases and enrich Hadassah by hundreds of millions of dollars.

Cynical and surreal - Iran

The newly "elected" government in Iran made three announcements last week that prove, once again, the showcase of cynicism that passes for policy pronouncements in Tehran is also a steep descent into the surreal world of the bizarre and tragi-comic

First, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's envoy to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), announced that his country will urge the UN nuclear watchdog at upcoming meetings to enact rules that will prohibit military strikes against atomic facilities around the world.

Second, Tehran reversed a year-long ban to allow IAEA inspectors to visit the nuclear reactor in Arak. It also said it would restore the ability of the IAEA that it had previously curtailed to monitor the vast nuclear complex in Natanz.

Third, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced the appointment of Ahmad Vahidi as his defence minister. Vahidi is suspected of having been a key participant in planning and approving the attack against the AMIA Jewish cultural centre in Buenos Aires in 1994.

Virtually every country in the western world is convinced that the Iranian nuclear program is an elaborate cover for a clandestine effort at building nuclear weapons. In an act of supremely impudent, even theatric, effrontery, Iran is now asking the international community (the IAEA) to prevent the dismantling of that program, in effect enjoining the United Nations to become complicit in its secret, dangerous ambitions.

In return for the desired insurance policy from the UN prohibiting the destruction of the Iranian nuclear facilities, Tehran is promising to let IAEA inspectors better inspect those facilities. But observers are dismissive of Iranian promises. As American officials stated loudly last week, Tehran has and continues to systematically violate its current commitments to the IAEA regarding its nuclear activities. In its next report to the UN, the IAEA is expected to confirm that the uranium enrichment activities at the main Iranian reactor in Natanz have expanded dangerously, illegally and precipitously.

But Iran's pretence to civility and co-operation can be seen for what it is – a sham and a shameful fraud – in the appointment of Vahidi as defence minister. It offends decency and conscience. There is an outstanding Interpol warrant for Vahidi's arrest. Argentine prosecutor Alberto Nisman said of the appointment that "Iran has always protected terrorists, giving them government posts, but I think never one as high as this one." The current AMIA president, Guillermo Borger, described the Vahidi appointment as "shameless and insulting."

The United States, Britain, France and Germany are expected to meet on Sept. 2 to discuss the next round of sanctions against Iran. It may be the last opportunity to effect a non-military halt to Tehran's drive to build nuclear weapons.

Let no one be fooled by Iran's latest diplomatic forays.

Let no one be fooled about the dire consequences of the failure to stop the Iranian race toward nuclear armament.

UCC Israel boycott resolution

I am appalled that the top leadership of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) attended the recent General Assembly of the United Church of Canada (UCC) in Kelowna, B.C., thus giving the church an undeserved credibility, and unsuccessfully attempted to influence the delegates gathered there not to adopt vicious anti-Israel, anti-Semitic resolutions presented to the meeting (UCC's anti-Israel resolutions shelved: reactions to the outcome range from optimism to contempt," Aug. 20).

I am even more appalled with the CJC's press release of Aug. 13, in which it commended the UCC for "rejecting proposals that endorsed [the] boycott of Israel," by implying that the boycott was removed from the resolution adopted at their meeting on the same day.

Besides a number of viciously anti-Israel statements included in it, the resolution clearly "directs" the General Secretary and the General Council of the church to "engage in consultation, dialogue and study and… take appropriate actions towards ending the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and enter into conversation as how to move the two peoples towards reconciliation (including, but not limited to economic boycott)."

Even worse, the next paragraph further "recommended" that not only the General Council, but all the UCC conferences along with their "Presbyteries, congregations and community ministries," do exactly the same to end the "illegal occupation of Palestinian territory… (through means) including, but not limited to economic boycott."

This is the "boycott" that the CJC applauded the UCC for removing from their resolution, and it obviously did not mean the boycott of Hamas or Fatah!

Proposal for United Church

I suggest the following proposal for the good folks of the United Church of Canada: "It is very laudable to desire and support peace. No country in the world wants peace more than Israel, which has been forced into at least six wars (1947, 1956, 1967, 1973, 2006, 2009) in the last 60-odd years, with never-ending terrorism to fill the brief periods in between.

"Israel will always be the first to compromise for peace. The Palestinians, however, categorically refuse to accept Israel's right to exist. Instead, they teach their children the 'virtues' of murder and suicide.

"Israel even attempted unilateral compromise by leaving Gaza completely in 2005. This achieved the election of Hamas, and proved that to date Palestinians are more interested in afflicting Israel with almost daily barrages than in proper self-government.

"So yes, working for peace is most laudable and must start with the proper education. One that imbues its people with a desire and a willingness to live in peace, and not simply die for the sake of murder and 'holy' infamy.

"Let the UCC resolve to help to educate the opposing parties in the meaning and the dynamics of peace. It is a long-term and, God willing, achievable goal."

The last time I checked, the Jewish left did not appear to lack media outlets in which to communicate its message ("Need left-wing views in CJN," letters, Aug. 20). Count among them the Toronto Star, our country's largest daily newspaper, and the CBC, our national public broadcaster, as well as many other substantial media outlets. These outlets build their Israel narrative around the disinformation spread by supporters of the anti-Israel cause, and seem to take particular delight when the disinformation comes from left-wing Jewish sources. To suggest that the president of the Canadian Jewish Congress would somehow be aided in fulfilling his mandate if The CJN added more voices of the "active left" in The CJN is truly naive ("New CJC head aims to mend relations with left," July 30).

The writer goes further, suggesting that The CJN run more left-leaning items of which he might more readily approve. To its credit, The CJN does reprint articles from Ha'aretz and runs other left-leaning items and op-eds that do not necessarily meet with my approval. I don't like it, but too bad for me. It's a free country.

The writer's apparent belief that The CJN should self-censor politically incorrect terms that offend him reminds me of the recent unsuccessful attempt by the Canadian Human Rights Commission to silence Ezra Levant and Maclean's magazine for printing an article that they postulate intended to offend the sensitivities of certain members of our society. Simply intending to offend or actually offending someone's feelings is not against the law in Canada, at least not yet. And for this the writer should be grateful.

A philosopher whose call is for responsibility

By ROBERT GIBBS

"To be or not to be: that is not the question." Emmanuel Levinas, a leading Jewish French philosopher, challenged contemporary philosophy by arguing that there was a more important issue than the question of being.

In late June, the University of Toronto hosted an international gathering of 100 scholars for the annual meeting of the North American Levinas Society, where the theme was Philosophy And Its Others. Research on Levinas has expanded rapidly in the last decade, and many of those attending were graduate students and younger professors who reached across a wide swath of fields, including philosophy, education, literature, religious studies, classics, history, law, psychology, political theory and of course, Jewish studies.

Levinas was born in Lithuania in 1906, studied in France and Germany, taught and then was director of the Ecole Normale Israélite Orientale in Paris. He was a leader in the French Jewish community, and in addition to writing ground-breaking philosophical works, he also published several important books, focusing on the ability of talmudic reasoning to address ethics today. He was a survivor of the Holocaust, having served time in a hard labour camp while many members of his family perished. After the publication of his first main work, Totality and Infinity, in 1961, he held university teaching positions, concluding at the Sorbonne. He died in 1995.

But if Hamlet's question is not the question, what is?

For Levinas, the task is to consider how I am for another, a responsibility that looks beyond what is (and even what is not) other than being. Levinas offers two of the three famous questions of Hillel in his own unusual translation:

• "If I do not answer for myself, who will answer for me? If I answer only for myself, am I still myself?"

Ethics originates for Levinas in this particular doubled accountability: only I can answer for me. Ethics singles me out as one who has to give an account, to justify myself before others for what I am doing. Ethics is not primarily a set of universal rules or laws, but rather the origin of my sense of self, as called upon to respond. Moreover, to be me is not only to respond for myself, but it is also to be for the other person, to be responsible for others' deeds, even for others' responsibilities.

• "All Israel is responsible for each other."

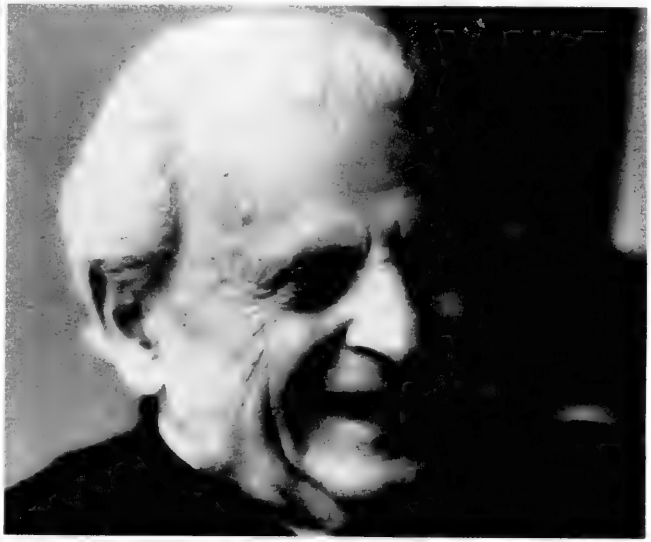
In a radical move, Levinas argues that the crisis of our world is not the problem of survival, but rather the problem of responsibility. The assumption that I can define my own space and my own freedom without being accountable for anyone else produces the bystander's complacency. The question of the meaning of being is a detour from the more basic question of the meaning of responsibility.

Levinas has become a key thinker for this new wave of scholars because they find the claims for ethics both irresistible and extravagant. He dares them to reconsider our culture as one that uses knowledge to hide from our neighbours.

The greatest interest in his work is found in the universities, and he writes philosophy in a way that presumes a philosopher's education. At the universities, scholars try to understand the interaction of ideas of responsibility and ways of interpreting art and literature, laws and social relations. Many philosophers are concerned to find the structures of consciousness and the ways that our bodies are conscious.

But Levinas contests many of our assumptions in exploring how we are responsible for other people and even for their responsibilities. For example, he argues for an alternative view of how we live in our bodies. He writes about our aging skin, our muscle fatigue, the maternal body nurturing the fetus, the lung drawing into it air that does not belong to the body, the skin touched in a caress – trying to allow us to think about our physical vulnerability.

Levinas played a key role in the rebirth of Jewish studies in Paris. He helped create an annual colloquium series for Jewish intellectuals in the early 1960s. He himself came to Talmud and commentary after World War II, but he offered public interpretations of texts, encouraged widespread study of traditional texts and also spearheaded translation projects into French.



Emmanuel Levinas

In that role, he also published essays and talmudic readings for a broader public. Many philosophers ignored these writings for some time, but now there are few leading scholars who do not recognize that the Jewish writings are interwoven with the academic philosophical writings. His Talmud seems like a philosopher's; his philosophy is steeped and shaped by Judaism.

The relation of Judaism and philosophy gives rise to a long-standing debate. Levinas himself refused the description "Jewish thinker." In the French university (and for a time in Canada as well), to accept the term "Jewish" would be to qualify the philosophy.

If it were really philosophy, the assumption goes, there would be no trace of the community from which the thinker comes. Sometimes philosophy makes exceptions for Greeks; sometimes for French or for Germans, and sometimes even for English speakers – the only ones who are direct, clear and rigorous enough.

But the French Academy is suspicious of religion, and all the more so of Judaism. Emil Fackenheim was teaching in Toronto almost a decade before Levinas was appointed in France. And in response to that resistance from the French Academy, Levinas wrote philosophy that drew upon Jewish thought and traditions, but was often phrased in a general vocabulary. He wrote his philosophical works (as said above) for the trained philosophers. His argument was with them, and in many interesting ways, he managed to insinuate into philosophy a view of ethics that was deeply rooted in Judaism.

I hesitate to add that Jewish communities also are often suspicious of philosophy. In its thirst for universality and its reliance on Greek (and German) models of thinking, philosophy seems to undermine the authority of Talmud and Scripture. One might recommend studying the Mishneh Torah, but still caution someone to steer clear of the Guide for the Perplexed, both of which were written by Maimonides, the Rambam. But in the modern period, philosophy has emerged in our culture as a distinctive force. Modern Judaism has engaged philosophy in its various guises, and some of its key movements are indebted to modern philosophy.

In the last century, there was a string of truly great Jewish thinkers, each deeply engaged in philosophy. Perhaps because of the emancipation of the Jews, or perhaps because of the crisis of the Shoah, or perhaps because of the crisis in modern philosophy, these thinkers were able to advance views of Judaism within philosophy, to reorient radically what philosophy could be.

I am referring to Hermann Cohen, Martin Buber, Franz Rosenzweig and finally Emmanuel Levinas. In each case, the commitment to the Jewish community and to philosophy were matched, and indeed, interwoven. They each held that for the Jews to live in our world, a rigorous philosophical thinking was required – and that the world needed a renewing Jewish vision.

Emil Fackenheim is also an example of the modern Jewish philosopher, focusing on German idealism, but also writing and teaching Jewish thought in the community and eventually at the University of Toronto. He bridged the Jewish community and the university, and his sheer brilliance as a philosopher garnered support for the field of Jewish philosophy around the world as well as in Toronto.

Of some interest in this context, is that Levinas did write about Fackenheim, and respectfully challenged Fackenheim's interpretation of the Jewish responsibility after the Shoah. For Levinas, the responsibility to prevent the destruction of our Jewish community must be translated into a responsibility to prevent such destruction befalling any community.

Levinas does not cite Hillel's third question, and I wish to end with that. Normally it is read as: "And if not now, when?"

Just as Levinas' account of the body is quite different from what we usually think, so, too is his view of time. Levinas recognized the great power of story and of the self as telling its own story.

Thinking or speaking or writing, I can draw together my past and my present and my future. All of time is held in a continuous thread that I weave. But for Levinas, the key moment is when someone else addresses me, when a beggar awaits my donation, a student listens for my comment, when someone objects.

This encounter with the other person interrupts that thread of my story. If I then tell someone else the story of my being interrupted, I tie up that other person in my story. I might even include her story, as part of mine. But the challenge, the disruption is gone. The present (the now of Hillel) is too easily replaced by my account, by my report of the now.

Levinas claims that the true now is not like a story, but like an interruption, or rather, like a summons – the now of being under command, a command that I cannot make into part of my story without betraying its call to me. This now is "not yet": it is urgent and comes from a past that I cannot remember or retell.

Responsibility is my assignment, but it is not mine to complete, Levinas says. And so one of the key elements of his thought is a reflection on the messianic. His account of responsibility understands peace to be more fundamental than war, and struggles to explore how the opportunity for an act of generosity that is not merely a tactic, but where I am for the other person, is a possibility for the messianic in any moment.

That absolute future is not awaiting us after hundreds more years. It is calling to us in an urgent now. And if it cannot be heard now, then there is no anticipatable future in which it could.

Levinas' work is a call to philosophers and to our world to heed the call to our responsibilities.

Opinions

Naomi Klein's faulty premises

Amid much fanfare, anti-globalization crusader Naomi Klein visited Israel, Gaza and the West Bank last month. This is, of course, the same Naomi Klein who is front and centre in promoting the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel, and who has described Gaza and the West Bank as Israel's "laboratories" where Palestinians "are no longer just targets; they are guinea pigs."

Lawrence Hurt in Hamilton

So what then was the reason for Klein's trip to the region? Why would someone who calls for a boycott of Israel actually go there? Well, never at a loss to rationalize her actions, she claims she came ostensibly to launch the Hebrew translation of her book The Shock Doctrine. And when challenged on why she would support the Israeli publisher whom she'd contracted to do the translation – when surely this broke her boycott – she explained that the book's proceeds would go to the publisher and not to her. "In other words," she stated, "I am boycotting the Israeli economy but not Israelis."

Yet while Klein's apparent generosity is no doubt seen as commendable by her many minions, I can attest, as someone who grew up in apartheid South Africa, that BDS is a decidedly blunt instrument that strikes indiscriminately at anyone who drifts into its cross hairs. It's the essence of a collective punishment that would almost certainly be condemned by Klein and her followers were it to be applied in any other situation – and rightly so.

But aside from the flawed premise that underpins Klein's separation of the Israeli people from their state, there is the even more fundamental fallacy that it was BDS that, according to her, "was the dynamic that ultimately ended apartheid in South Africa." This assertion, though frequently parroted, actually rings rather hollow.

In fact, sanctions were thought to have had relatively little to do with the eventual demise of apartheid. Instead, political and labour unrest generated from within the country was considered to be a much more powerful catalyst. And what had the most impact internationally was not sanctions; it was the collapse of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s – which undercut Communist support for the African National Congress, thus ending Moscow's proxy war against the South African regime. A peaceful transition of power to Nelson Mandela then became feasible.

Nonetheless, while there is no proof that BDS campaigns are actually effective, it's evident that they do have other uses along the way to their often spurious objectives. As we've already seen in Israel's case, they provide an added vehicle for negative stereotyping, discrimination, bullying and demonization. Klein's motives need to be seen in this context and vigorously countered.

West Bank economy booms

Guest Voice

Michael B. Oren in Washington, D.C.

Imagine an annual economic growth rate of seven per cent, declining unemployment, a thriving tourism industry and a 24 per cent hike in the average daily wage. Where in today's gloomy global market could one find such gleaming forecasts? Singapore? Brazil? Guess again. The West Bank.

According to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the West Bank economy is flourishing. Devastated by the violence and corruption fomented by its former leadership, the West Bank has rebounded and today represents a most promising success story. Among the improvements of the last year cited by the IMF and other financial observers are an 18 per cent increase in the local stock exchange, a 94 per cent growth in tourism to Bethlehem – generating 6,000 new jobs and an 82 per cent rise in trade with Israel.

Since 2008, more than 2,000 new companies have been registered with the Palestinian Authority in the West Bank. Where heavy fighting once raged, there are now state-of-the-art shopping malls.

Much of this revival is due to Palestinian initiative and to the responsible fiscal policies of West Bank leaders – such as Prime Minister Salaam Fayyad – many of whom are American educated. But few of these improvements could have happened without a vastly improved security environment.

More than 2,100 members of the Palestinian security forces, graduates of an innovative program led by U.S. Gen. Keith Dayton, are patrolling seven major West Bank cities. Another 500-man battalion will soon be deployed. Encouraged by the restoration of law and order, the local population is streaming to the new malls and movie theatres. Shipments of designer furniture are arriving from China and Indonesia, and car imports are up more than 40 per cent since 2008.

Israel, too, has contributed to the West Bank's financial boom. Former British prime minister Tony Blair recently stated that Israel had not been given sufficient credit for efforts such as removing dozens of checkpoints and road blocks, withdrawing Israeli troops from population centres, and facilitating transportation into both Israel and Jordan. Long prohibited by terrorist threats from entering the West Bank, Israeli Arabs are now allowed to shop in most Palestinian cities.

Furthermore, several Israeli-Palestinian committees have achieved fruitful co-operation in the areas of construction and agriculture. Such measures have stimulated the Palestinian economy since 2008 resulting, for example, in a 200 per cent increase in agricultural exports and a nearly 1,000 per cent increase in the number of trucks importing produce into the West Bank from Israel.

The West Bank's economic improvements contrast with the lack of diplomatic progress on the creation of a Palestinian state. Negotiators focus on the "top-down" issues, grappling with legal and territorial problems. But the West Bank's population is building sovereignty from the bottom up, forging the law-enforcement, civil and financial institutions that form the underpinnings of any modern polity. The seeds of what Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called "economic peace" are, in fact, already blossoming in the commercial skyline of Ramallah.

The vitality of the West Bank also accentuates the backwardness and despair prevailing in Gaza. In place of economic initiatives that might relieve the nearly 40 per cent unemployment in the Gaza Strip, the radical Hamas government has imposed draconian controls subject to sharia law. Instead of investing in new shopping centres and restaurants, Hamas has spent millions of dollars restocking its supply of rockets and mortar shells. Rather than forge a framework for peace, Hamas has wrought war and brought economic hardship to civilians on both sides of the borders.

The people of Gaza will have to take notice of their West Bank counterparts and wonder why they, too, cannot enjoy the same economic benefits and opportunities. At the same time, Arab states that have pledged to assist the Palestinian economy in the past, but which have yet to fulfil those promises, may be persuaded of the prudence of investing in the West Bank. Israel, for its part, will continue to remove obstacles to Palestinian development. If the West Bank can serve as a model of prosperity, it may also become a prototype of peace.

Beware the Jeremiah syndrome

Ever since the prophet Jeremiah warned Jerusalemites of destruction and exile if they didn't change their ways, the Jewish people have been plagued by a continuous stream of imitations.

With the creation of Israel and the challenges faced by the restored Jewish state, the number of Jeremiah "wannabes" seems to have grown. Politicians, professors, columnists and bloggers have assumed this role, and a few have even taken the name "Jeremiah" as a pseudonym. Predicting doom and gloom, and berating others – particularly those with less extreme visions – for alleged moral infractions, has become a major industry.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But a great deal of caution needs to be exercised in drawing analogies between our times and the events from 26 centuries ago, when the Babylonians conquered Jerusalem, destroyed the Temple, and exiled the tribes of Judea and Benjamin.

Now, long after the age of prophecy has ended, it is more difficult to distinguish between those who have something serious to say and the many false prophets in our midst. Self-appointed and self-promoting messengers come from the far ends of the political and social spectrum – left and right, haredi and fundamentalist-secular – and seek to impose their private views and psychoses. They are usually hostile to democracy, and unable to gain support through the ballot box, they use access to money and power to impose their agendas. This is far from Jeremiah's model.

A close reading of the biblical text shows that the original Jeremiah clearly did not want the job (like his professional colleague Jonah) and frequently pleaded to be released from this extremely unpleasant task. In contrast, modern, self-appointed prophets have huge egos. They desperately seek the attention accompanying warnings of the imminent demise of Israel or the disappearance of the Jewish people. These are not people who dislike the limelight and argue with God to avert the forthcoming punishment.

In recent years, the Jeremiah industry has flourished by claiming moral infractions by the Israeli military in defending the country from terror attacks. Otherwise insignificant individuals – including failed politicians – have gained a huge amount of attention and funding from those eager to spread allegations of Israeli abuses, regardless of whether or not they are backed by serious evidence.

In the spirit of gender equality, female aspirants to prophesy are also taking this route, including journalist Naomi Klein and New Israel Fund president Naomi Chazan. (The biblical Naomi from the Book of Ruth was an embittered woman, at least until the happy ending.)

Other Israel-focused gloom-mongers greatly exaggerate the political and military threats, warning that any sign of flexibility or closing down of outposts will bring instant destruction. For some Jeremiahs in this group, U.S. President Barack Obama and his advisers are portrayed as the personification of evil, eager to sacrifice the Jewish people to reach their goals.

Iran is also a popular topic for the prophets of imminent disaster. While the dangers are real, the painters of these black scenarios understate Israel's power and resilience. What is needed in response to such threats is a careful assessment of the situation and best options, and not obsessive panic pumped up by headline writers and bloggers with little understanding of the details.

Turning inward, we have the constant warnings that the Jewish people are on the verge of disappearance due to religious fanaticism, on one side of the scale, or religious pluralism and ignorance of the sources on the other. Jews have survived and evolved under adverse conditions for more than 4,000 years, and predictions of the end of "Jewish history" are also exaggerated.

None of this should be confused with a call for complacency. The Jewish people have suffered a number of massive tragedies after the Roman destruction of Jerusalem and exile, including the expulsion from Spain and the Nazi Holocaust. Pollyanna-ish predictions of instant and painless peace agreements, or of Jewish continuity without education, are no better than nightmarish prophecy.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Lodz

Lodz was a melting pot in the 19th century, a city in Poland's heartland in which Polish, German, Yiddish, Russian and even English and French were spoken.

Wladyslaw Reymont, in his novel The Promised Land, portrayed Lodz in such rainbow hues.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

Before Poland attained its independence in 1918, following bouts of partition and colonization in the 18th century, Lodz was a magnet for German, British and French immigrants.

Germans, in particular, flocked to Lodz, and by 1840, no fewer than 80 per cent of its population was German.

The most successful German newcomer, Karol Scheibler, settled down here in 1848 and proceeded to build an empire spun out of cotton. In short order, he became the city's most prominent textile magnate and one of Poland's wealthiest men.

"Ethnic Germans created Lodz's industrial base," said Marek Szukalak, a local historian.

Scheibler's chief rival was a Jew, Izrael Kalmanowicz Poznanski, whose immense red-brick factory employed thousands of workers (and has been turned into a mall known as Manufactura), and whose adjacent neo-baroque palace at 15 Ogrodowa St. was the talk of the town.

Until his death in 1900, he remained unsurpassed as a Jewish entrepreneur. Yet Poznanski had some company. Businessmen such as Markus Kohn, Borys Wachs and Jakub Herszberg also accumulated great wealth, adding value to Lodz's economy.

Israel Poznanski

Their prominence notwithstanding, the majority of Jews in Lodz, comprising one-third of its population by the 1930s, barely scraped by, especially during the Great Depression. Typically, they were craftsmen and petty merchants, with a sprinkling of professionals.

By the outbreak of World War II, 230,000 of Lodz's 672,000 inhabitants were Jewish, while 62,000 were of German stock.

In the face of Germany's unprovoked invasion in 1939, the Polish army crumbled. One of the soldiers who tried to stem the Teutonic tide was my father, David, who was wounded in a battle and dispatched to Germany for medical care.

The German army conquered Lodz on Sept. 8, smashing the Polish forces commanded by Gen. Juliusz Rommel.

Proceeding to annex Lodz, Germany renamed it Litzmannstadt and unleashed what would be a reign of terror. Jews were harassed, shops were vandalized and synagogues were burned down.

Reading the handwriting on the wall, thousands of Lodz Jews, including my aunt, left Lodz, fleeing to the Soviet Union.

In 1940, the Nazis created a ghetto with 160,000 Jews crammed behind its walls.

My father, having recuperated from his wounds, was repatriated to the Lodz ghetto, where he worked as a fireman. My mother toiled in one of its grimy workshops.

The ghetto elder, Chaim Rumkowski, fervently believed that he could save the Jews if they worked hard and kept production lines humming.

He was wrong, dead wrong.

The ghetto was liquidated in the summer of 1944, the last transport to Auschwitz leaving the Radegast railway station on Aug. 29. My parents were among the deportees. Somehow, they survived the ordeal, along with several thousand Jews from Lodz.

By one estimate, 40,000 Jews returned to Lodz after the war, when Poland was thrown into a spiral of political turmoil.

The 1946 Kielce pogrom prompted most of them to emigrate. As a result of this development and the flight of its German minority, Lodz, for the first time in its history, morphed into a ethnically homogenous city.

Today, Lodz – the hub of Poland's film industry – is a microcosm of Poland, with more than 90 per cent of its residents being of Polish origin.

Still, the legacy of Lodz's Jewish past looms large, thanks to the array of luminaries it has produced, from the film producer Artur Brauner and the novelist Jerzy Kosinski to the architect Daniel Libeskind and the poet Julian Tuwim.

By the early 1960s, when Poland was a Communist state with close ties to the Soviet Union, Lodz was home to upward of 3,000 Jews.

But in the wake of the Six Day War, the Communist government in Poland launched a thinly veiled anti-Semitic campaign couched in anti-Zionist rhetoric.

"It was especially intense in Lodz," said Szukalak, referring to the fact that one of its masterminds, Mieczyslaw Moczar, the minister of interior, hailed from Lodz.

The slanderous anti-Jewish campaign, rooted in a power struggle in the Communist party, led to the departure of about 30,000 Jews, most of them staunchly secular and thoroughly assimilated, from Poland.

By the early 1990s, when Poland had already shaken off communism in its peaceful transition to democracy, Lodz's official Jewish population stood at 100.

During this period, a hip young musician from Lodz named Krzysztof Skowronski achieved a measure of fame with his rock 'n' roll/reggae band.

Until the age of 13, he had no idea he was Jewish. "My parents were secular Jews who didn't keep Jewish traditions," he said. "My mother told me, 'It's dangerous to be Jewish in Poland.'"

In 1986, after a life-changing trip to Israel, he dropped his Polish name and began calling himself Symcha Keller.

Keller, whose mother was hidden by Polish Christians during the Holocaust and whose father steadfastly refuses to discuss that era, studied Hebrew and Judaism with two old learned Jews in Lodz.

Having pumped them dry of their knowledge, he continued his studies at an ulpan and at a yeshiva in Israel. He then lived with Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach in New York City.

In 2004, he was ordained as a rabbi. He is still the only rabbi in Lodz.

Rabbi Symcha Keller (Sheldon Kirshner photos)

Now 46 and Orthodox, Keller is also president of the local Jewish community, a title he has held for the past nine years.

There are officially 300 Jews in Lodz, whose current population is 750,000 and is twinned with Tel Aviv. But as far as he knows, an additional 700 Jews remain unaffiliated.

To the best of his knowledge, nearly half of all married Jews in Lodz are in mixed marriages. Last year, by his count, the community registered seven births, seven marriages and three bar mitzvahs. Since the demise of communism in 1989, hundreds of Jews who passed as Catholics in Lodz have come out of the woodwork, while the median age in the Jewish community has dropped to 50.

Last year, 20 nominally Catholic families began identifying themselves with the Jewish community, whose headquarters on Pomorska Street contain a synagogue, a canteen, a youth club, a dairy restaurant, a medical clinic, a hotel and, most recently, a mikvah.

Its activities are funded by the U.S.-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation.

"It's a huge challenge to be a Jew in Poland," observed Keller, whose stentorian voice conveys a sense of authority. "During Communist times, Jewish life was paralyzed. We have to start anew."

In a reference to the Holocaust, which wiped out 90 per cent of Polish Jewry, he said, "We are living in the biggest Jewish graveyard." Yet Keller is optimistic.

There were 15 conversions to Judaism in 2008, all performed at an Orthodox ceremony in Monsey, N.Y., and Keller expects still more conversions in the future.

In his estimation, there may be as many as 5,000 Jews in Lodz today still masquerading as Catholics.

Pioneer in trauma care receives Order of Canada

Tile attributes successful career to a broken ankle

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Marvin Tile, 76, an orthopedic surgeon who was recently appointed a member of the Order of Canada, attributes his career to a broken ankle.

"I was a student at Harbord Collegiate, and I was an all-star basketball player. I [was injured], though, playing football. I got high marks because I had nothing to do but study."

Tile, who was appointed to the surgical staff of Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in 1966 and went on to become chief of orthopedic surgery in 1971 and surgeon-in-chief from 1985 to 1996, was honoured for his contributions as a clinical orthopedic surgeon, a teacher and a researcher.

He graduated from University of Toronto medical school in 1957, and was attracted to orthopedics, he said, "as are many athletes. Orthopedics is a magnet for athletic people. When I [conduct interviews], I find it amazing how many people had athletic involvement or injuries. There is a definite [link]."

Before he stopped operating in 2000 – he stopped seeing patients last year – he had performed more than 4,000 hip and knee replacements. "These surgeries changed people's lives. I was known in the community," Tile said.

He now acts as orthopedic medical adviser on the Ontario Workplace Safety and Insurance Board Tribunal.

Tile is known worldwide for his work in trauma care, and has become a world authority in the treatment of pelvic and acetabular (socket of the hip joint) trauma.

He has trained clinicians from around the world in the care of patients with critical orthopedic injuries, and has published two books and 59 manuscripts that have shaped the practice of orthopedics across the globe.

He said that "trauma is a whole different ball game [compared to other injuries.] The definition of trauma is multiple-system injury. It means head and chest, and several fractures.

"The first hour after injuries is critical; we call it the golden hour. That is the window we have for saving the patient's life.

"When I graduated from medical school, trauma was treated in a haphazard way, and injured patients were taken to the nearest hospital. Trauma units did not exist, and patients often died because they were not treated properly in that first golden hour."

Dr. Marvin Tile

When he was working at St. Joseph's Health Centre and part-time at Sunnybrook as a consultant in 1966, he said, "I had visited major orthopedic centres in Europe, and I approached the chief surgeon at Sunnybrook and told him we needed a focus. Along with a team of surgeons, we lobbied the government, and a trauma unit was approved. It took five years for us to open our doors."

As the first and – and now the largest – unit in Canada, they immediately got busy with road trauma, he said. "We hired a surgical team trained in trauma, and the volume of patients [kept increasing]. Very little polytrauma is treated in the community. Paramedics are trained to make a decision, and to bring patients to us when necessary.

"We see about 1,200 patients a year. When we opened, we saw very little gunshot or knife wounds; now, 20 per cent of the patients come in with gunshot or knife wounds. That's the changing face of the city."

Currently, Tile said, there are seven trauma units in Ontario, and they are all covered by helicopter and co-ordinated by telephone through Sunnybrook. "We can now take advantage of that golden hour. We save lives and improve quality of life."

He added that Sunnybrook has ties with Hadassah Hospital in Israel, and the two hospitals run the Sunnybrook Hadassah Orthopedic Exchange. "We trained five Israeli fellows last year," said Tile, who has visited Israel "at least a dozen times" since 1965.

Receiving the Order of Canada is a tremendous honour, said Tile, who is married to Esther, and has four children and nine grandchildren.

"They give out about 120 a year, and only 10 per cent are doctors. We're looking at a small number of people, and there are so many worthy doctors."

MaRS Innovation aims to commercialize science

A tall, athletic-looking man who has been at the helm of MaRS since June, he likens research commercialization to an art. As he put it, "When science is treated properly, it can turn into a meaningful product."

While research commercialization in Canada is hardly uncommon, Hofstein believes that the ratio between it and science is still too low."Compared to Israel, Boston and the San Francisco Bay area, there is not enough of an entrepreneurial spirit in Toronto. The science here is top-notch, but people probably don't recognize research commercialization sufficiently enough."

The problem is exacerbated by a shortage of capital. "This is a risky investment sector, but the returns can be high."

Israel, if only by default, is highly entrepreneurial. "We don't have oil or valuable minerals like gold or zinc," said Hofstein, who was born in Hadera and grew up in Pardes Katz. "All we have is intellect. It's our only natural resource, and we have to nurture it."

The president of the University of Toronto, David Naylor, agrees with Hofstein.

Having visited last year, Naylor came to the unsettling conclusion that in the global race to build an innovation-based economy, Canada lags behind countries such as Israel, Singapore, South Korea and Taiwan.

As he wrote in a piece published by the Globe and Mail, "Our national output of discoveries is impressive… But the commercialization record of Canadian universities is modest. Our best performers generate far less revenue than their U.S. or Israeli counterparts. And, when it comes to turning discoveries into popular products and services, our outputs are under-exploited."

In short, he observed, "commercialization works if its main players – government, university and private sector – are linked in a system where each plays its own role."

Out of a field of several hundred candidates, Hofstein was chosen to run MaRS. "My mandate is to change the status quo," he said.

Paul Young, the University of Toronto's vice-president (research), said he was selected due to his stellar resume.

"He has an excellent combination of skills in international finance, private sector business and university research that will help the entire Toronto research community. Successful research commercialization is really about making connections between various sectors, and Dr. Hofstein has a proven ability to bring government, business and academic research together."

At Hadasit, Hofstein served as chair of its holding company, Hadasit BioHolding Ltd., which is publicly traded on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

In addition, he was responsible for clinical trials with industry partners and the launch, development and oversight of medical devices, biomedicine and diagnostic equipment spin-off companies.

Prior to Hadasit, he was president of Mindsense Biosystems Ltd. in Israel and Ecogen Inc. in the United States.

"It was hard to leave Israel," said Hofstein, whose 19-year-old son is currently completing his military service and whose wife, Orit, is an artist and photographer. "But I have found a tremendous co-operative spirit and attitude in Toronto. Everyone is on board and understands the mission."

The pressure to produce tangible results by the end of his five-year contract is high, but he is upbeat.

"With all the tools given to me, and the outstanding science here, I expect to translate at least five projects into profitable events that will contribute to the local economy."

The Yeshiva University Family

is deeply saddened by the passing, in Toronto, of the beloved wife of the late revered Haham, Rabbi Dr. Solomon Gaon. She was his partner in promoting Sephardic heritage during his three decades as Chief Rabbi of the Sephardic Communities throughout the British Commonwealth and his several decades as Director and Co-founder of YU's Sephardic Studies Program and its Jacob E. Safra Institute of Sephardic Studies from 1964 until his passing. She was wise, gracious, regal in manner and devoted to her family and the Jewish people. She contributed much of the Haham's library, writings and correspondence to the Mendel Gottesman Library and the YU archives.

Heartfelt condolences are extended to her children Raquel Goldstein and Isaac (and Tova) Gaon and to her grandchildren.
May the entire family be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Canada only country to get two new consuls

He cited recent examples of anti-Israel advocacy in Toronto over the last year, including increased activity during Israeli Apartheid Week on campuses in the city, protests at the opening of the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum and attempts to get Mountain Equipment Co-op stores to boycott Israeli goods

Echoing Ziv's remarks, Gissin said the decision by the Israeli foreign ministry to give the nod to two new diplomatic appointments in Canada could only be seen as a positive development.

He also remarked on the fact that Canada is the only country in the world getting two new Israeli consuls.

"This is very significant. Even the U.S. – with all its [Israeli] consulates, embassy and mission to the UN – they got only one additional diplomat," he said.

"This reflects the growing importance of Canada to Israel and the excellent partnership between the Canadian Jewish community and the State of Israel. This keeps developing and requires more layers and personnel."

He added that "this also reflects the importance of the Toronto Jewish community and as an arena for Israel from a PR, cultural and commercial point of view. In my opinion, the [Israeli] foreign ministry took the right decision."

Nominating committe to review candidates

Ziv noted that Israel's Canadian contingent of diplomats is not the only one benefiting from additional resources and personnel from Israel.

"We have embassies and missions all over the world. We are opening several in the coming year. We're re-opening [offices] in Wellington, [New Zealand], Sao Paolo, [Brazil], and opening in Tajikistan. So in addition to [Israel's] deciding to open more missions around the world, the decision, luckily, was also made to strengthen some of the missions that need more."

The identities of the new envoys to Canada are unknown. A tender for applicants was made late last week by the Israeli foreign ministry. A nominating committee will review candidates and make its decision in the next few months, Gissin said.

"Generally speaking, increasing the consulate's staff will enable us to do much more in presenting the positive face of Israel in Toronto and Western Canada through media presence, cultural activities and the use of the Internet and social networks."

Gissin said he has no say in the selection of the candidate for his consulate, but he hopes to use his new deputy to help combat anti-Israel sentiment in Toronto and Western Canada.

Israel's enemies "are putting in a lot of effort to attack Israel in Toronto and Canada," he said.

Provincial byelection in St. Paul's set for Sept. 17

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Voters in the Ontario riding of St. Paul's will go to the polls in a provincial byelection to elect a new MPP on Sept. 17

The byelection became necessary after incumbent, former Liberal cabinet member Michael Bryant, vacated his seat in June to work for Invest Toronto corporation

One of the major issues expected to fuel the debate in the riding is the Liberal provincial government's plan to create a harmonized sales tax, which would merge the eight per cent provincial sales tax with the five per cent federal GST

St. Paul's is bounded on the north primarily by Eglinton Avenue West; on the east by Bayview Avenue, Moore Avenue and the Don River tributary; on its south by the Canadian Pacific railway south of Davenport Road; and on the west by parts of Ossington Avenue, Winona Drive and Dufferin Street.

According to the 2006 census, St. Paul's is home to approximately 111,000 people, 68 per cent of whom are tenants. Estimates peg the riding's Jewish population at around 15,500.

The median household income is $53,905.

The CJN will feature more in-depth reports on candidates, issues and platforms in the weeks leading up to the byelection.

As of deadline last week, only the Liberal and Green parties had officially nominated candidates

Eric Hoskins will represent the Liberals. He is founder of international charity War Child Canada and was an adviser to former federal MP Lloyd Axworthy.

Chris Chopik, a realtor and community activist, will run for the Green Party.

It's expected that Toronto Sun newspaper columnist Sue-Ann Levy will represent the Progressive Conservative party

The New Democratic Party is scheduled to choose its candidate on Sept. 9.

McMichael sculpture tells partisan fighter's story

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An unlikely friendship between a Holocaust survivor and an Inuvialuit sculptor brought up in the western Arctic has resulted in the creation of a stone sculpture that is on exhibit at the McMichael Canadian Art Collection in Kleinburg, Ont., north of Toronto.

The sculpture is by Abraham Anghik Ruben, 58, who now lives in British Columbia. It tells the story of Leon Kahn, who survived the war – he died in 2003 – as a partisan fighter.

Anna Stanisz, assistant curator of education at the McMichael gallery, said the seeds for the sculpture – on loan to the gallery by the Kahn family for one year – were planted when Ruben read Kahn's memoir, No Time to Mourn: The True Story of a Partisan Fighter.

"The book is about a young boy on his own who is trying to survive, and Abraham identified with him," she said. "He felt such a connection to the author that he requested a meeting, and he asked Leon if he could tell his story in sculpture."

In a telephone interview, Ruben, who has been sculpting for 35 years, said that after meeting Kahn and reading his book, "I came up with the idea and then made sketches, which became the working drawings for the stone sculpture."

He also consulted with Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder and dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center Museum of Tolerance, to ensure that the facts were correct.

"I put Leon's story into the sculpture, but I also included the story of Europe."

The "allegoric" sculpture, he said, is constructed in three layers, and the story is developed vertically.

On the base of the sculpture are the Ten Commandments (one of the scrolls is in memory of Kahn's family who perished in the Holocaust), a menorah and a Star of David, said Ruben. "The sculpture then starts with the total and utter destruction of European Jewry."

"I depicted the concentration camps and included their names, and then showed people being liberated and in the embrace of partisans. The next layer takes place after the Holocaust, when people are trying to understand the experience. The sculpture very much follows the pattern of the book.

"It is a complex piece, and people have to see it to realize its impact. It includes humans scrambling to get air, the uprising of the ghettos and partisans flight to the forest."

About eight feet high, the sculpture stands on a pedestal in the lobby of the gallery. It took about nine months to complete, Ruben said. "During that time I went through periods of depression and had many nightmares. I would have to put the piece aside and work on something else for a while. It had a tremendous effect on me."

Abraham Anghik Ruben's sculpture

From the McMichael gallery, the sculpture may be moved to the West Coast, and then on to Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, Ruben said.

He intends to use this sculpture as a model for an outdoor bronze sculpture, to stand 16 feet high and four feet in diameter, he said. "I would like to pay more attention to the flowering of the State of Israel in the bronze piece."

City of Toronto proclaims UJA Week

United Jewish Appeal launches annual campaign

By Sally Szuster

UJA Federation's Campaign 2010 was launched this week and, with more than $15 million pledged already, the campaign is off to a tremendous start.

Even Toronto Mayor David Miller got into the spirit of things, officially declaring August 23 to 29 United Jewish Appeal Week to, as he said, "encourage everyone to recognize UJA and the significant contributions of our large and vibrant Jewish community."

Lay leaders, canvassers and UJA-affiliated agency representatives gathered at the Air Canada Centre on Tuesday to inaugurate the campaign, which shows strong momentum. Campaign proceeds will be invested in programs to meet the urgent needs of Toronto's most vulnerable, improve lives in Israel, battle anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism on campus and connect young people to Jewish life through essential identity programs and formal Jewish education.

"UJA . is efficient and effective philanthropy; smart philanthropy with heart," said Ken Tanenbaum, who is chairing Campaign 2010, along with Debbie Kimel. "We believe that this campaign is going to truly shine a spotlight on our community as an outstanding global leader, driven by compassion, vision and commitment to those most in need," added Kimel.

Toronto Mayor David Miller at a recent UJA event with Campaign Chairs Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum.

Since the current economic downturn began, many UJA affiliated social service agencies are reporting a dramatic spike in client demand for assistance in dealing with unemployment, financial distress, addiction and abuse. While the economy is showing signs of a turn-around, those most affected by a weaker economy require considerable help.

This year, the UJA Federation budget allocated an additional one million dollars for the most vulnerable members of Toronto's Jewish community.

"While many North American Federations have been forced to cut allocations, thanks to the generosity of our community and UJA Federation cost containment measures, we have increased support for those who need it most," said organization chair, David Koschitzky.

The campaign launch featured guest speakers Brian Burke, president and general manager of the Toronto Maple Leafs and Arna Poupko Fisher, as well as those who have benefited from the support of UJA partner agencies, and Ethiopian Israelis helped by UJA.

Building a Better Life:

He got the job!

Year after year, United Jewish Appeal provides a much needed safety net for thousands of vulnerable in Toronto and Israel by lifting them from the challenging circumstances they face, especially during these difficult economic times.

Together with UJA Federation's network of agencies, we are responding to a dramatic rise in services needed to assist those in need, be it the poor, the elderly, new immigrants, or Jewish students on campus.

The following is the first in a series of Jewish Toronto stories that put a face to the statistics and how UJA is transforming lives, across the street and across the globe.

Parnossah WorksCanada (PWC), which assists Jewish job-seekers in Toronto, is dealing with an exponential demand for support. There are currently close to 500 clients on the waiting list for employment services.

Until recently, Igor Khrapal was one of them.

Igor fled the Soviet Union as it was breaking up. He came to Canada where he met his wife, Sue. There were hardships over the years and, in 2007, they moved to Toronto to start a new life. Despite two university degrees, Igor could not find employment. Seeing her husband grow more desperate and hopeless, Sue contacted JVS Toronto. The next day, through Parnossah WorksCanada, a UJA funded program at JVS, a counselor set up an action plan and a job interview for him. Igor got the job!

"Igor is in a very good place now," says an emotional and relieved Sue. "I love to look at his face now because his eyes no longer look haunted and old. When we were celebrating his new job, you could see the difference in him. He was more confident, relaxed and more like the man I married. At one point he looked at me, his eyes filled with tears and said, 'Sue, I'm fifty years old now, but I've never been happier. It's my time now!'"

Boys club members still gather 60 years later

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In 1949, a group of teenage boys from working class families living in the College Street corridor joined together to form Club Orion.

They met at one of the YMHA buildings at 12 Major St., just north of College Street.

With very little money to spend on recreation, the boys arranged sports activities and social events that, over the years, melded them together into a family-like group.

They have continued to meet and share special events for the past 60 years.

In an 89-page album, using their own words and numerous photos, they have now recorded the history of their members and events that reflect a fun-loving and supportive group of men.

Now in their 70s, they continue to come together to share stories from the past and bring each other up to date on current events in their lives.

In the early years, the late '40s and '50s, they formed baseball and basketball teams that won numerous awards.

Mike Flicht, one of the founding members, said in an interview that during Toronto's oppressive heat, when financially comfortable families could afford to go to their cottages and resorts, "the Club Orion boys went to the Boardwalk and Sunnyside Beach. Some of us would pile into a half-ton truck and take off to places such as Pontypool, Pickering or Bell Ewart."

In those days, he recalled, the club played in community playgrounds, at 44 St. George St. and later at the new YMHA when it opened on Bloor at Spadina.

"We were the first club at the new Y," he said. "We held meetings and social events there. And to get away from the heat of the summer, many of our members went to work at Camp Northland."

Many years ago, they became known as the College Street Cowboys, after an article about Club Orion written by David Lewis Stein appeared in a daily newspaper.

The large and professionally completed Club Orion album records many events – socials, weddings, trips – and an account of their history. Throughout the years, most of the original members remained close friends. In the album, they speak of their years together as "the best of times," and include their school photos, sports teams, reunions, invitations for socials, street scenes and references to Lansdowne and King Edward public schools, which many of the boys attended.

They went on to different high schools and universities and became successful in their professions and businesses.

Despite their diversity and the different directions their lives took, they have remained a close and cohesive group of friends. As they celebrate their 60th anniversary, they look forward to continued friendships and the opportunity to retell their stories of the best of times.

New drug hope for kids with leukemia

New Israeli research that links childhood leukemia to a protein mutation found in adults with a common blood disorder holds out hope of a cure.

The discovery holds out hope for a possible new treatment for children suffering from blood cancer. A drug now in clinical trials for the adult disorder could also prove effective in treating a similar mutation in children with leukemia.

Each year, about 4,500 children in the United States are diagnosed with leukemia, according to the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society, making it the most common childhood cancer.

For most children who receive this diagnosis, the prognosis is good. About 80 per cent of them will recover and go on to lead healthy lives. For 20 per cent, however, the illness will prove deadly.

Dr. Shai Izraeli, of Tel Aviv University's Sackler School of Medicine and Sheba Medical Center, began research into this field when he and his team discovered a mutation of the JAK2 protein in patients with Down syndrome.

Izraeli's discovery was published recently in the prestigious medical journal The Lancet.

Children with Down syndrome are 20 to 30 times more likely to develop leukemia during childhood than are other children. Izraeli discovered that children suffering from Down syndrome who developed leukemia had JAK2 mutations.

In an effort to corroborate his finding, Izraeli collaborated with the iBFM Study Group, a European childhood leukemia consortium. He studied 90 cases of Down syndrome leukemia from all over Europe. He discovered that the JAK2 mutation was present in 20 per cent of these cases.

The Israeli team suspected that this protein might also be linked to other disorders and diseases – and further research proved them right. A similar mutation of the JAK2 protein found in Down syndrome and leukemia also causes polycythemia vera, a disease common in adults that leads to the overproduction of blood.

"This is perhaps the first example of two very similar – but different – mutations that apparently do the same thing in a cellular protein," says Izraeli. "But they're associated with two completely different disorders, one that causes polycythemia in adults and the other that causes leukemia in children."

A new drug based on inhibitors of JAK2 has been developed to treat polycythemia and is now in clinical trials. Izraeli says that this drug could offer "potential hope" to children who suffer from the highest risk of leukemia.

If the clinical trials go well, the researchers believe the drug could be fast-tracked through approvals and made available to child leukemia sufferers within a few years.

"JAK2 inhibitors are not based on chemotherapy. The first experiences with these treatments show very few side effects," says Izraeli.

"All that researchers need to do is to expand these clinical trials to children and adults with high-risk leukemia – and that can happen relatively quickly. We will know in just a few years what these drugs are capable of."

Izraeli adds that typical chemotherapies for leukemia also have a high "toxicity cost."

Children with leukemia are treated with 10 to 12 different chemotherapies over a period of two to three years. As a result, some children suffer long-term and irreversible damage, such as neurological, heart or bone problems, or sterility.

Researchers looking for viable alternatives to chemotherapies may turn to Izraeli's research as a promising avenue for success.

"Our research gives hope and life to the 20 per cent who might not make it, as well as those who may experience a relapse," says Izraeli.

MITZVAH KNITTERS: The Shaar Shalom Mitzvah Knitters has grown to more than 60 knitters and crocheters of all ages since the group's inception in spring of 2006. To date, members have donated nearly 3,000 handcrafted items to a variety of individuals and non-profit organizations. Yarn is either donated or purchased with money raised by fundraising projects and or received from private donations. The group begins its fourth year on Sept. 14 at 7:15 p.m., at the Shaar Shalom Synagogue. The knitters meet on alternative Monday evenings. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

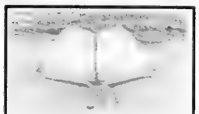
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Conversion: an act of free will

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

This week's parshah introduces the case of a beautiful woman captured as a prisoner of war. The Torah is very specific as to what is to be done.

Numerous are the horrific stories we hear about innocent, young female victims of war who are raped and left to their degradation and eventual death.



Rabbinic Reflections

The Torah recognizes the weakness of the passionate lust that can be felt when a soldier sees a beautiful captive woman. Furthermore, it was the custom that in time of war, when a city was captured, women would dress up and beautify themselves to save their lives and possibly petition on behalf of their families.

The Torah mandates that should such an encounter occur, the soldier is to bring the girl into his home and have her change to more modest clothes, shave her head and allow her nails to grow for 30 days, as an expression of mourning for her parents. At the end of this period, he may marry her.

The idea behind having the girl make herself as unattractive as possible and waiting for a specific period of time is to calm the passionate lust and allow for a change of heart, as it was feared that such a marriage would fail if it took place at a time of weakness.

If the marriage ultimately did take place, but soon afterward the husband wished to divorce the woman, he would not be allowed to treat her disrespectfully, but would have to free her in an honourable manner.

If the captive has opted for a conversion, then she remains a Jewish woman after the divorce, but if she has been forced to convert, she is free to return to her people and original customs.

This episode gives us an insight into the morality expected of a soldier. The Torah commands the Jewish soldier to conduct himself with the utmost integrity and to control his passions, despite the lust that can be felt in such times of unrest.

And what does this say about forced conversion? For a conversion to be valid, people must choose of their own free will to accept the moral code of the Torah and accept the mitzvot. This responsibility is unconditional. Whereas it is accepted that a convert's performance of the mitzvot can be practised gradually as they are learned, it is not accepted that a convert may choose the mitzvot at his or her convenience. Complete and gradual commitment is expected, and if this contractual agreement is abrogated, it can result in the revocation of the conversion.

Should children be involved, the abrogation of the mother can lead to questions as to whether the children's conversion is kosher. When the children reach the age of maturity, they are asked if they wish to remain Jewish. If so, it is recommended that they undergo a giyur lechumra, a further conversion, to remove any possible doubts resulting from the mother's status. This applies to children who are committed Jews, but even more so to noncommitted Jews.

Evidently, those entertaining the prospect of conversion must be clear about their engagement and commitment, as this is not a light matter and will indelibly have life-altering consequences for the children, and ultimately for the Jewish community at large.

Rabbi David Cadoch leads Shabbat services at Beth HaRambam Synagogue in the Maimonides Geriatric Hospital in Cote Saint-Luc, Quebec.

Success brings its own responsibilities

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

From Cambridge to Kalamazoo, a major thrust of any educational institution's efforts consists of raising funds for both existing costs and any new initiatives.

To that end, the contributions of major donors are central, but they do not come without a price. Rare are the donors who simply see the virtue of the project to which they are committing money and require no other thanks than to see the success of the venture.

The Mishnah's dictum, "Who is honoured? He who honours others," has become an ironic mantra for many schools and communal organizations.

Rita Hauser, who was campaign co-chair at a multi-year fundraising effort at Harvard in the 1990s, put it this way: "You can't get money from some people unless their name is in lights 20 feet high."

The lights are burning full blaze in many Jewish institutions that often have to beg and borrow – hopefully not steal – to meet their needs. Many a person asking for funds for a school has had to endure the humiliation of donor arrogance. There is a big difference between legitimate questions about a school's particular economic efficiency or priorities and a hypocritical parsimoniousness when it comes to education.

There is also a fundamental distinction to be drawn between warmly thanking those who offer financial support – Jewish ethics would demand nothing less than appropriate gratitude – and pretending that such people now have extra insight about educational decisions because of their monetary gifts.

The financial crisis has had a definite impact on many people everywhere, but there are still numerous situations where that same money is spent on lavish personal desires. Such is human nature, many would argue. That people have the right to do exactly what they want with their money and should feel no guilt over where they spend it is undoubtedly true from a western democratic perspective. Whether it is equally valid from Judaism's point of view is dubious in the extreme.

We have been blessed by God for a reason. The honour that accrues to rich people is a central test of how we view divine providence. Is the monetary success one has enjoyed indicative of one's own power and skills? That way hubris lies. The Torah warns, famously, as the Jews are about to enter the Land of Israel: "[Take care] lest you eat and be satisfied and you build good houses and settle… and you increase silver and gold for yourselves, and everything that you have will increase – and your heart will become haughty and you will forget HaShem your God… And you may say in your heart: "My strength and the might of my hand made me all this wealth." (Deuteronomy, 12-13, 16)

Such "forgetfulness" is prevalent in our society. But what would exist in a world of truth would be not the institution pacifying the donor, but rather a common recognition of the immense privilege that God has entrusted to the materially successful to be capable of aiding in the continuation of Jewish learning and the fulfilment of Jewish historical destiny. That is honour enough for a lifetime, and beyond.

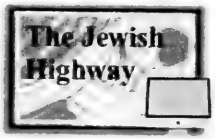
Challahs: a spiritual journey, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



Although I couldn't find any statistics to back me up, I think it would be safe to assume that more challah will be consumed next month than at any other time of the year. Between Rosh Hashanah, before and after Yom Kippur and Sukkot, there is no shortage of opportunities to sample challahs, both familiar and exotic.

A challah, of course, is far more than just another tasty egg bread. It is a golden loaf steeped in thousands of years of tradition. From the baking to the cutting to the eating, there are many beautiful rituals associated with challah. There are traditions about why it's braided [tinyurl.com/challah01] or why some people refrain from eating the end slice of the bread. [tinyurl.com/challah02]

And why the blessing is said over two loaves on Shabbat. In Exodus 16:5, the children of Israel were commanded to gather a double portion of manna for the Sabbath. "On Friday, they will have to prepare what they bring home. It will be twice as much as they gather every other day." [tinyurl.com/challah03] Nowadays, the two loaves are symbolic of the double portion of manna given to the Israelites on the eve of the Sabbath.

The word "challah" actually refers to the small piece of dough that is separated from the batch before kneading. Thousands of years ago, it was set aside for the priests. [tinyurl.com/challah04] Nowadays, the mitzvah of baking challah is considered one of the three fundamental mitzvot associated with Jewish women. [tinyurl.com/challah05] (The others are niddah, the observance of the Torah's guidelines for maintaining the ritual purity of marital life and the lighting of candles to welcome the Shabbat and festivals into our homes.)

However special challah may taste these days, it is hard to imagine what it was like a few generations ago. Abraham Joshua Heschel tried to paint a picture: "In the shtetls of eastern Europe, our ancestors six days a week would eat the coarse, dry, black bread of the peasants, but on Shabbat they would eat challah, a bread of such richness and sublime delicacy, that by comparison it was more like cake than bread; much like the contrast between the six days of the profane week and the holy day of Shabbat." [tinyurl.com/challah25]

In my next column, I'll look at some great challah recipes on the web. Today, I conclude with two stories about very different uses for challahs.

Jeff Rosenberg had hot tickets for a Bob Dylan concert that was being held on the Saturday night between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. After Dylan's encore, Rosenberg tossed a round raisin challah onto the stage. The challah bounced around and finally found itself resting near the superstar's feet.

"His eyes met mine, as if asking, 'Was that you who threw that?' I spread my arms out and mouthed the words, 'Shanah Tovah.' At which point, the man's expression turned from one of amusement, slowly, to something more like humility. And he mouthed the words to me, 'Thank you.'" [tinyurl.com/challah07]

Jeffrey Rosen had a very different goal in mind when he shared some homemade challah with his girlfriend one special Shabbat. [tinyurl.com/challah08]

"As she cut into the challah, the knife stopped cutting when it touched something inside the challah. Earlier in the day, I discreetly removed a small piece from the bottom of the challah, placed a small grey jewelry box in the centre of the challah, and reattached the piece of challah. She screamed and said a rat was in the challah. She looked inside the challah again and took out the grey jewelry box. She opened up the box and took out the ring. I asked her to marry me, and she said 'yes.' She kept the jewelry box, which has a knife mark on the top – a sign to remember our engagement."

All I can say is… challah-lujah!

Otzma helps strengthen grad's connection to Israel

By ELISE LOTERMAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

While many university students and graduates are fortunate enough to spend time in Israel, few have the opportunity to experience living in rural, almost exclusively Hebrew-speaking communities, hear from world-class speakers about the matzav (political situation) in Israel, have access to incredible volunteering and internship opportunities and have a great group of people to experience it with.

This past year, I was a participant on OTZMA 23, a program jointly supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto through United Jewish Communities and the Jewish Agency for Israel. I, along with 52 other college graduates from across North America, dedicated a year of our lives to strengthening our connection with Israel and the Jewish community and engaging in tikkun olam, social justice work to make Israel a better place.

During the first part of the program, I lived in northern Israel, in Natzrat Illit (Upper Nazareth). While most of the group was engaged in Ulpan learning, I had the opportunity to volunteer in the community because of my Hebrew-speaking background from my Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) education.

I spent my mornings working at a sheltered workshop assisting individuals with various challenges assemble and package various objects while having the opportunity to socialize with them. In the afternoon, I volunteered at Hafuch Al Hafuch, an after-school centre for youth at risk. This centre provided me with a glimpse into the lives of Israeli teenagers and allowed me to understand some of the added challenges and pressures of being drafted into the army immediately following graduation.

During this part of the program, our group lived in a "mercaz klitah" (absorption centre) and saw the immigration process first-hand, as well as the challenges that immigrants – specifically those from Russia and Ethiopia – encounter upon their arrival in Israel.

Yerucham, a small town near Dimona in the middle of the desert, became my home for the second part of the program. I lived and volunteered with three other girls, and became friends with students from Ben-Gurion University who lived in the student village near our apartment. We were welcomed into this warm and friendly community with open arms and always had ample invitations for Shabbat meals.

I spent two mornings a week tutoring high school students English and taught them about some of the differences between the Jewish communities in Israel versus North America. The other three mornings I spent volunteering at the seniors daycare centre in the community. My activities there included meeting seniors from around the world and hearing stories about their absorption into Israel, collecting and translating recipes to create a cookbook, and helping with programming such as bingo and pre-Shabbat activities.

In Yerucham, our group of volunteers took the initiative to run an English conversation class with university students living in the town. This program provided them with an opportunity to improve their English, as well as provided everyone with a forum for dialogue and cultural exchange.

For the internship component of the program from Pesach until the end of the year, I worked at the Shalom Hartman Institute as its marketing and development intern. This institution is a Jewish pluralistic research and education centre. I produced proposals and reports, researched subjects on the Internet, wrote articles about the value of the institute's work, wrote and edited grant applications, translated and edited documents and prepared presentations.

Elise Loterman in front of the ancient amphitheatre in Ceasarea, Israel

Being in Israel's capital during Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron, Yom Ha'atzmaut, Lag b'Omer and Yom Yerushalayim allowed me to commemorate and celebrate both religious and secular holidays in the city of Jerusalem, which was an amazing and very special experience.

Other highlights of the program included an all-night sllchot seminar, a five-day seminar about conflict and hope; hiking, swimming and camping with the group; visiting a jail and learning about the justice system; and visiting the Knesset and meeting with a member of Knesset.

Overall I learned a tremendous amount and strengthened my connection to Israel. Even though I have only been back for a few weeks, I already miss the country, the language and the culture. But, I know that I am lucky enough to live in a city like Toronto, which has many kosher restaurants and cafés and a community with a deep-rooted connection to Israel. Meanwhile, I anxiously await my return to Israel to reunite with everything I know and love halfway around the world.

Participating in the OTZMA program was an incredibly fulfilling personal experience for me, and I would urge young members of our community between the ages of 20 and 26 to contact UJA Federation about the program. Applications are still being accepted for this fall. Contact Zeeva Millman, the director of the Joshua Institute for Jewish Communal Leadership, at 416-849-3137 and zmillman@ujafed.org.

Elise Loterman is pursuing a master's degree in humanities, focusing on religion, at York University this fall. She is looking forward to staffing a Birthright Israel trip next summer.

Calgary donates transport incubator to MDA

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Members of the Switzer Family Foundation and Calgary Friends of Magen David Adom gathered at the Switzer's Elbow River Casino Restaurant in Calgary recently.

The Aug. 14 meeting marked the donation of $50,000 from Sam Switzer and his family to Calgary's Magen David Adom (MDA) chapter for the purchase of a transport incubator, which will help save the lives of Israeli children.

This is not the first gift Calgary Friends of MDA has sent to Israel — the Calgary chapter began fundraising in 2006, during the Second Lebanon War.

Nava Wainer, a Calgarian originally from Israel, visited her friend Fanny Wedro and Wedro's husband, the late Leo Wedro, during the war. The three couldn't take their eyes off TV news reports, in which Israelis were running from a fire and MDA ambulances were driving into the flames. Wainer knew she had to do something to help the Jewish state.

"Maybe we should raise money for an ambulance," she said.

"How will we do that?" Fanny wondered.

Leo answered, "What a woman can do, a division of soldiers can't accomplish."

So Wainer, Fanny Wedro and their friend Debbie Halpern established Calgary Friends of MDA. Wainer's husband, Samuel, and Dr. James Cohen became co-presidents, and the group, which also includes several board members, began raising funds for a mobile intensive care unit ambulance for Israel.

The ambulance cost $105,000, with additional funds necessary for equipment, supplies and spare parts, which must be replenished and maintained. Wedro says that it didn't take long to raise the money. "People were very eager to help. The Calgary community was wonderful."

Dr. Warren Bean, who now lives in Toronto, mobilized doctors from Calgary hospitals to contribute funds. Jews and non-Jews donated to the project, along with the Switzer Family Foundation. The Switzers "saw how great the cause was," says Wainer.

In less than three months, the ambulance, which was built in Quebec and was one of eight ambulances sent by Canadian MDA, was flown to Israel.

MDA was established in Tel Aviv in 1930. Israel's only national first-aid society, it maintains ambulance and blood services, and conducts training in first aid and pre-emergency medicine, including volunteer training.

Calgary MDA receives notice of what equipment is most urgently needed from Arnold Rosner, national executive director of CMDA in Montreal, who gets this information from Yoni Yagadofsky, international liaison for MDA Israel.

After raising money for the transport incubator, Calgary's next project was to raise funds for First Aid Emergency Scooters. The scooters cost $25,000 each. Darlene Switzer-Foster was one of the first in Canada to donate a scooter.

These three-wheeled scooter ambulances weave in and out of Israel's crammed, narrow streets, and can reach people faster than a larger ambulance can, says Sam Switzer. The scooters carry paramedics who help patients until a larger ambulance arrives.

Switzer spoke about Israel's excellent medical care from personal experience. In February 2009, he was stuck in a heavy traffic jam in Israel. The weather was abnormally hot and a number of people fainted, including Switzer. In less than three minutes, an ambulance came.

Switzer was taken to a hospital immediately, where he had an electrocardiogram and other tests without waiting. "They gave me the best of care," he says.

Israel's ambulance system is efficient despite the fact that the majority of MDA workers are volunteers. "There are about 1,200 paid MDA employees and the rest, about 14,000, are volunteers," says Wedro.

In Canada, there are about a half-dozen paid CMDA employees who work in the Montreal headquarters and in the Toronto office. Everyone who works in the other CMDA offices, in London, Hamilton, Ottawa, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Regina, Victoria and Calgary, is a volunteer.

The Calgary MDA chapter recently raised nearly $50,000 in the Calgary community toward a second incubator. "By next month, we'll have $50,000," says Switzer. The group also constantly fundraises for maintenance of existing equipment and for the training of Israeli medical staff.

As well, Calgary MDA holds educational sessions open to the public, with speakers such as stem-cell expert Dr. Samuel Weiss. Harvey Rabin, an infectious diseases doctor, will be the chapter's next speaker for an event it hopes to hold this fall.

Calgary MDA spreads the word about MDA as much as possible, even appearing on radio programs such as High River's 1140 AM show Gospel Road.

Cohen, Calgary's MDA's co-president, and his son, Laurence, recently made a 10-minute documentary called Life in the Day of Magen David Adom, which followed the Calgary-Switzer ambulance in Israel. The film was screened in Calgary in May.

While filming, Laurence talked to the oldest paramedic in MDA. "He's 57 years old, and he has a book of newspaper clippings that his son made him about the lives he's saved over the years," Laurence says.

Wainer quotes the Talmud, saying: "To save one life is as if you have saved the world."

She adds, "We're always responsible to the people of Israel, and they know they can count on us."

Coast to Coast

Times op-ed sets aside conventional wisdom on conflict

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

An Aug. 11 New York Times op-ed with the provocative title "The two-state solution doesn't solve anything" brought authors Hussein Agha and Robert Malley back into the Mideast media spotlight.

Agha is senior associate member of St. Antony's College, Oxford, and co-author of A Framework for a Palestinian National Security Doctrine (June 2009). Malley, the director of the Middle East program at the International Crisis Group, was a special assistant for Arab-Israeli affairs to former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

The two first came to prominence almost a decade ago for writing a series of articles and exchanges in the New York Review of Books with former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and historian Benny Morris. They defended former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat against the charge that he rejected Barak's offer of a viable Palestinian state during the Camp David/Taba talks.

More recently, in "Obama and the Middle East" (New York Review of Books, June 11), Agha and Malley argued that "the more the two-state solution looks like an American or western, not to mention Israeli, interest, the less it appeals to the Palestinians."

Agha and Malley don't entirely dismiss the notion that U.S. President Barack Obama, along with the international community, could succeed in getting both sides to make the "necessary compromises" for a two-state agreement. However, they see such an agreement, if not resting on a proper foundation, as leading to major instability. Instead, the two recommend "an attempt to transform the political atmosphere and reformulate the diplomatic process." But how?

Their answer is that Israelis and Palestinians need to first and foremost deal with "basics – namely, acknowledging and redressing injustices suffered by Palestinians [1947-48] and providing Israelis with the recognition and normalcy historically denied them."

This last point is reiterated in the New York Times op-ed: to make real, sustainable progress, Palestinians and Israelis must return to, and try to heal, the "core" issues of their conflict stemming from the 1948 war.

For Israelis, this means having Palestinians acknowledge the legitimacy of the Jewish character of Israel. For Palestinians, it means the recognition of their displacement in 1948 and of their "right of return" (to Israel).

Some Israeli analysts found the Agha-Malley Times piece refreshing in that it sets aside the conventional wisdom that issues like settlements and borders are key to unravelling the conflict.

However, the surface appeal of the argument masks an essential asymmetry that Agha and Malley did not acknowledge: Israel's Jewish character is no threat to establishing a Palestinian state, while the Palestinian insistence on their "right of return" to present-day Israel means the end of Israel as a Jewish state – and the end of a genuine two-state solution.

Agha and Malley fail to extend their argument to its logical conclusion, writing instead that "the heart of the matter is not necessarily how to define a state of Palestine. It is, as in a sense it always has been, how to define the State of Israel."

In their longer New York Review essay, the authors suggested engaging Palestinians, especially refugees, in the Middle East and the Diaspora, and even Israeli settlers, in discussions about the past and their hopes for the future. No agenda was proposed, time frame set or outcome suggested. Just a loose proposal that would almost certainly protract discussions of grievances forever.

The Toronto Star went all out to correct the record about a quote wrongly attributed by columnist Haroon Siddiqui, in 2004, to former Israel Defence Forces chief Moshe Ya'alon. Siddiqui, along with other writers, had quoted Ya'alon as saying: "The Palestinians must be made to understand in the deepest recesses of their consciousness that they are a defeated people." The fact is Ya'alon never uttered those words.

In "Damaging Israeli misquote finally corrected" (Toronto Star, Aug. 8), Oakland Ross explained at length how the misquote came about, gained a life of its own and was finally corrected. In addition, the Star issued a formal correction in the same issue. The Star is to be commended for paying such attention to the essential journalistic standards of accuracy and fairness.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

COMPLETING THE DREAM

ש'שאר ע'נינ

גידי קורן וחברים

הרקע המדאיג של אובאמה

תודה לנינה על הדברים הבאים.

הבישום ו.א.ג'קסון ידוע כאחד ישראל נלהב ואמן. לאחרונה הוא יצא במאמר אחדה חמור לכל אוהדי ישראל שיש לקחת איתו ברצינות מירבית. מקוצר היריעה אני אני מביא לכם רק את עיקר הדברים.

הבישום, שגם הוא אאובאמה שחור, ובונר משפטים בהארוורד. אומר שהוא מזהה אצל אובאמה דברים שרק מי שגדל ברקע כמו שלו ושל אובאמה יכול להבחין:

"כל ימי הייתי עד לגישה האנטישמית של הקהילה השחורה של ארה"ב. גישה זו קיבלה עידוד רציני מעליית רעיון "האומה האיסלאמית " של לואיז פארחן, אך התחילה הרבה קודם. ג'סי ג'קסון השתמש בכבוד הנאצי "הימי" כלפי יהודים שנים רבות קודם לכן. אני שומע את זה מבני משפחתי המוסלמים, שבעיניהם היהודית הם קהל רודף ממון ובצע ושונא שחורים. בשיקאגו שממנה צמח אובאמה המצמד עוד יותר חמור. הנשיא הנוכחי היה בקהילתו של ג'רמיה רייט במשך עשרים שנה ושמע אותו נושא דרשות אנטישמיות השכם והערב. הוא היה בקהל שתמך בפארחן האנטישמי במצעד מליון האנשים שלו.

השמאל האמריקני הקלאסי רואה בישראל מדינה שמדכאת את הפלשתינאים. אובאמה מגלה סימני הזדהות עם השקפה זו. בנאומו המפורסם לקהילה המוסלמית הוא לא נגע בכלל בשנאה המוסלמית ליהודים.

עד כאן ציטוט של דברי הבישום ג'קסון.

לדעתי לא נסון לראות את הדברים כפשוטם:

עצם הצלחתו של אובאמה להגיע לנשיאות נבעה מיכולתו להתנתק מסטריאוטיפים של צבע, מעמד חברתי, ומיכולתו לשכנע את האומה האמריקאית שצריך להתחיל להסתכל על העולם והבעיות שלו בעיניים שונות וחדשות. ועל כן-זה שהוא ישב בכנסיה בשיקאגו עשרים שנה לא הופך אותו לתומך אוטומאטי של הבישוף רייט. וזה שהוא דורש מישראל להסיק לבנות התנחלויות עוד לא הופך אותו לתומך במוסלמים-כדאי לזכור ששבעים אחוז ישראלים מתנגדים לבניה בהתנחלויות-ועל כן על פי אמת מידה זו דורש אובאמה את מה שרוב הישראלים רוצים, ומה שישראל התחייבה לו פעמים רבות בעבר, רק מצאה דרך להתחמק מיישומו.

כמה בדיחות יהודיות לקרן שהולך להיגמר

"יה עתה חזרתי מטיול מענג במיוחד-הבאתי את חמותי לשדה התעופה".

"מישהו גנב את כרטיס האשראי שלי והחלטתי לא לדווח על כך. משום הוא מבזבז הרבה פחות מאשתי".

"בית הספר לרפואה של הארוורד סיים עבודת מחקר על השאלה מדוע נשים יהודיות אוהבות כל כך אוכל סיני? זה משום בגלל ש Won Ton הוא ההיפוך של "Not Now

"בחור צעיר מצליב לאימו בפלורידה לשאול לשלומה."אני מאוד חלשה, היא אומרת, כבר לא אכלתי 38 ימים". "מדוע אינך אוכלת כל כך הרבה ימים?" מדעתך הבן, "משום לא רציתי להיתפס עם פה מלא מזון במקרה שתטלפן אלי...."

ילד חוזר ומספר לאימו בשמחה שקיבל תפקיד בהצגת סוף השנה של בית הספר. "איזה תפקיד?" שואלת האם. "אני אהיה האבא היהודי" עונה הבן בגאווה. מדעתך האמא ואומרת לו: " רוץ בחזרה ותגיד למורה שאתה דורש a speaking part (תפקיד שיש בו טקסט).

בחור טייל באפריז וראה כלב רוטווילר תוקף ילדה. מייד הוא קפץ, נאבק בכלב, חנק אותו והציל את הילדה. כתבי השלוידיה המתלהבים ברכו אותו "כל הכבוד-גיבור פריזאי מציל ילדה". תיקן אותם הבחור שאינו פריזאי. "אוקיי, אז נודיע שגיבור צרפתי הציל ילדה". תיקן אותם הבחור שהוא בעצם תייר ישראלי.

בחדשות הערב הודיעו בראש המהדורה ש"ישראלי הרג כלב של ילדה קטנה בפאריז".

Pro-Israel group has prominent place in pride parade

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Concerns that an anti-Israeli group would steal the show at a gay pride parade did not materialize, while a pro-Israel Jewish gay group was given a prominent place in the lineup.

A group calling itself Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QAIA) had hoped to attract at least 100 marchers in the parade held on Aug. 16, but mustered only about 25. They were also relegated by organizers to near the end of the two-hour procession of more than 1,800 participants who walked along René Lévesque Boulevard East.

In contrast, the Star of David-festooned entry of Ga'ava, a group affiliated with Hillel Montreal, was near the front of the parade. Its participation had the support of Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC), which applauded the organizers' handling of the matter.

There were no incidents, and the anti- and pro-Israel contingents never came in contact with each other. Ga'ava's incoming president Karen Hoffman said other parade participants and spectators lining the street appeared to be quite accepting of the presence of a pro-Israel group.

"A lot of people were cheering us," Hoffman said.

Ga'ava (Hebrew for pride) had about 15 people in its entourage, including QJC representatives and others. It drove a pickup truck, which bore a blue Styrofoam star at the front, another glittery blue and silver star on top of the bed, and an Israeli flag hung from the back. The Tel Aviv skyline was featured on both sides of the vehicle.

Participants also flew Israeli flags in which the blue was replaced by the rainbow colours associated with the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) people's movement.

Members of a multicultural dance troupe joined in with the Ga'ava entourage, some of them picking up its flags to wave, swelling its ranks to about 70, said Abby Shawn, chair of QJC's human rights committee, who rode on the Ga'ava float.

This was the first time QJC participated in the parade, but Shawn said this decision was made before the controversy over the anti-apartheid group began. "Congress has a history of protecting and promoting the rights of gay people," she said. "We are very pleased with the way the organizers responded us, giving us a place so near the front…The organizers distanced themselves from QAIA and did not allow them to hijack the celebration to disseminate their propaganda. They did their best to pre-empt any type of distortion."

QJC was also invited to a VIP cocktail reception before the parade, she added.

She also felt the spectators "responded to us very well; there was absolutely no hostility."

An unidentified woman carries an Israeli flag bearing the rainbow colours of the LGBT community in the Montreal gay pride parade.

The Jewish group was followed by a huge banner bearing a declaration of solidarity with the two young Israelis killed in a shooting at a Tel Aviv gay centre on Aug. 1. The banner, which had been hung the night before in the Sky Night Club, a popular venue in the Gay Village, bears hundreds of signatures including those of QJC president Adam Atlas, Bloc québécois leader Gilles Duceppe and André Drouin, the Hérouxville councillor, who gained international attention two years ago for authoring the small town's "standards" for immigrants.

Elsewhere in the parade, one man held signs reading in French "5 countries = the death penalty/ Iran, Sudan, Mauritania, Saudi Arabia, Yemen," an apparent critique of the intolerance of homosexuality by certain Islamic regimes.

The day before Ga'ava had an information table at an outdoor fair, held in connection with the parade, where it provided information about what it's like to be gay in Israel. This included a timeline of milestones in the community's progress since 1975, when the first gay and lesbian association was founded in Israel.

"We were trying to highlight how open Israel is to the gay community, compared to a lot of other countries," Hoffman said. "A lot of people stopped to read it, and there were no negative comments… about apartheid."

Ga'ava also included information about itself and Congregation Dorshei Emet, the Reconstructionist synagogue, which has a policy of openness to gay people.

Ga'ava, founded two years ago, and mainly serves students, but is open to older people, said Hoffman, a student at LaSalle College. This was the second year Ga'ava participated in the parade. It has no formal membership, but averages about 30 people at its events, she said. A larger number are on its Facebook and mailing lists.

The QAIA presence was endorsed by Tadamon, a group that promotes boycotting Israel and advocates the removal of Hezbollah from Canada's terrorist list, and the campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, among others.

In an advance press release, QAIA stated: "As queers, we are fed up with Israel's attempts to falsely brand itself as a safe haven for LGBT communities in order to divert the world's attention from its racist policies towards the Palestinian people. We believe all forms of oppression are related and that you cannot fight against homophobia while upholding apartheid."

They had hoped to repeat what happened in Toronto in June when some 200 people identifying themselves as Queers Against Israeli Apartheid marched in that city's gay pride parade.

B'nai Brith Canada had denounced the participation of such groups in the parade, claiming they are trying to "hijack" the event. Accusing Israel of practising apartheid is "hateful and ignorant," it said.

The parade was organized by a non-profit coalition called Célébration LGBTA Montréal and received funding from the Quebec government and City of Montreal, as well as from businesses. Célébration said that it decided to allow the anti-Israel group to take part because of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees.

It added, in a statement three days before the parade, that granting permission did not mean that QAIA views were endorsed by the organizers.

"In keeping with our policy of non-discrimination, we firmly oppose any message or demonstration of a hateful, racist, anti-Semitic, sexist, homophobic, heterophobic or xenophobic nature. Any derogation from this policy will be severely sanctioned."

Hoffman would have preferred not to have an overly political group like QAIA in the parade. But thinks it was probably "safer" to do so.

"Letting them in meant they had to play by the rules. If they had not been allowed, things might have turned uglier."

Kosher meat plant closes doors in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Minsky's Kosher Meats Inc., which opened what its owners described as the largest and most modern kosher meat-processing plant in Canada, has ceased operations after two years.

Marvin Stubina, the company's sales manager and a minority shareholder, said the matter is "in the hands of trustees, and we are trying to work something out with the bank."

He said the owners, who include Ron Simon of Toronto, have hopes of reopening.

Minsky's is a made-up name; there is no one named Minsky involved.

The company opened in a 21,000-square-foot facility in June 2007 in Park Extension, converted from a former non-kosher meat plant. Stubina said the facility was rented, with the option of buying.

The company, whose original president was Allan Cantor of Ottawa, planned to offer kosher consumers many of the features and conveniences enjoyed by non-kosher consumers, such as aged beef and marinated chicken breasts. It was also planning to move into prepared dishes that could be heated and served.

Supervised by Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir, the company at its peak was koshering, butchering and packaging under its own label fresh and frozen beef, veal and lamb; processing already koshered poultry; and producing a line of deli products that was selling in supermarkets and butcher shops, as well as to caterers and restaurants as far as away as Vancouver.

In its final year, Minsky's was producing only deli products, Stubina said, and most of that at the end was under the Baldwin Street label for a Toronto firm.

Cantor and Simon, who were both experienced in the food industry, had said soon after the opening of the plant that, if operated at full capacity, it could supply the current Canadian market for kosher meat two times over. The company, however, never came close to that level.

The plant's centrepiece was a custom-built mechanized production line. Minsky's also used an air-tight plastic wrap that was intended to keep meat fresh longer than conventional packaging.

Minsky's entry into kosher meat wholesaling was resisted by the small Orthodox concerns that dominated the business in Montreal, but Minsky's appearance was hailed by the Vaad, which praised its innovation.

Montreal-based Levitts Kosher Foods Inc., once the largest kosher-meat processor in Canada, went bankrupt in 2004 after 65 years in the business. Four years earlier, the company opened a 40,000-square-foot plant in LaSalle, an investment that was reportedly $6.5 million.

Rabbis urge YM-YWHA to reverse Shabbat decision

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL —The interdenominational Montreal Board of Rabbis is calling on the YM-YWHA to reverse its recent decision to open its facility on Shabbat.

"This decision was already opposed by a delegation of rabbis from our organization when it recently met with leaders from the Y," said board president Rabbi Adam Scheier.

"Montreal has always justifiably prided itself on being a traditional Jewish community and, as such, has set an example by maintaining the norms of traditional Judaism in all its communal institutions," he said in a statement. "These norms include sustaining a strict kashrut policy at all Jewish communal institutions and Jewish health-care facilities, and by treating Shabbat as a day of rest by keeping all of our communal institutions closed throughout Shabbat.

"Opening the Y on Shabbat not only breaks a longstanding commitment to and respect for Jewish tradition, but also undermines the cohesiveness that Montreal Jews have enjoyed for generations."

The board urged the members of the Y and the members of its board to reconsider this resolution and reverse its decision.

The board includes representation from across mainstream Judaism. Rabbi Scheier is spiritual leader of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Chassidic girls get top marks

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —A small chassidic girls' school has made it into the ranks of the top 10 high schools in the province, in terms of academic success, according to data released by the Quebec education department.

The Skver Community School, a French-language institution, placed seventh among the 594 secondary schools in the province in the June 2008 uniform exam results.

The annual report from the education department is based on nine exams written by all senior students: physical science; two in mathematics; Quebec and Canadian history; French or English as a first language; and four in their second language.

The ranking is calculated from the average mark on the exams and the percentage of students that passed them.

The 33 girls at Skver got an average of 82 per cent, and none of them failed an exam.

That compares to an overall province-wide average of 72.8 per cent (80.2 among private schools) and a pass rate of 84.2 per cent (95 per cent among private schools).

All of the Jewish schools beat the provincial grade average, except one, Académie Yéshiva Yavné, whose 11 exam-writing students had an average of 72 per cent and a pass rate of 77.8, ranking them 145th in Quebec.

The report, titled The Results of the June 2008 Uniform Ministry Examinations and Graduation Rates, is available on the education department's website.

Holiday Food Ideas

Editorial

The High Holidays, which begin with Rosh Hashanah on the first two days of Tishrei and culminate with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, are a time to reflect.

We take stock of our past year and repent for our sins, but we also look forward to starting the new year with a clean slate.

As in all Jewish festivals, food plays a prominent role in our observance of the holiday, and it is customary to eat sweet foods to signify the hope for a happy and sweet year ahead.

We make our challah sweet, and we bake it round to symbolize the unbroken circle of the new year to come. Some people place a ladder made of dough on top so that our prayers may ascend to heaven.

It is common to dip the challah in honey, and for some, it's traditional when they make Hamotzi, to continue dipping their bread in honey from Rosh Hashanah until after Sukkot. We also eat pomegranates whose seeds represent a new year filled with many mitzvot.

In many families, it is customary to incorporate sweet dishes into the holiday menu – they prepare recipes that have been in the family for generations or they look for new, innovative ways to bring in the sweet new year.

Tzimmes is a common dish on the holiday table because carrots are round and the dish is sweet, usually prepared with brown sugar or honey.

Many families have favourite holiday dishes that they prepare year after year and their dinner guests look forward to. Others scour cookbooks for dishes that are new and innovative. With our upcoming food supplements, we're hoping to share with you our writers' old family favourites and their new ideas.

All of us at The CJN wish you happy cooking, and most of all, a Shanah Tovah.

Food planning to make residents feel at home

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Clara Raymond, who comes from Bombay, India, first moved to Terrace Gardens Retirement Residence, she longed for her traditional foods

"She missed the chutney and basmati rice she was used to eating," said Devorah Ohayon, marketing director of the kosher residence, part of Revera Living

Ohayon said they worked with the chef and came up with a recipe for the chutney and rice, as well as a meat curry, "and Mrs. Raymond felt so much more at home. She just needed something familiar."

That is part of the joy of living in a retirement residence, she said. "We try to make it like home – it's not an institution. Living here is like having your own apartment, with services attached."

Under the direction of nutritionist Mechal Moral, the food services manager, the cooks prepare three meals a day for the approximately 60 residents, taking into account special diets, and likes and dislikes.

"We always discuss their diet with them, and we have a resident food committee who meet regularly to discuss the menu," Moral said.

As the Kashruth Council of Canada's (COR) first female mashgichah, Moral spends a lot of time overseeing the kosher aspects of the kitchens they have separate dairy and meat kitchens such as purchasing food, supervising the cooks, overseeing deliveries or lighting the pilot light on the stove if necessary.

"The cooks have been here for a long time, and they are well trained in kosher cooking. They make the best chicken soup and matzah balls."

She also has a treasure trove of cookbooks, which she uses to plan weekday, Shabbat and holiday menus. "We start with a basic menu, then we cater to the individuals. There are always alternatives."

Cook Clarita Egar stirs barley soup.

Rosh Hashanah meals are particularly festive, Ohayon said. "We cook comfort food, but we take it up a notch. We have to plan two days of holiday meals – residents can invite guests for holiday meals – plus the meal for Erev Rosh Hashanah, and we concentrate on the ambiance. We want the meals to be joyful."

Moral offers some of Terrace Gardens' favourite Rosh Hashanah recipes:

POMEGRANATE NUT SALAD

2 heads lettuce
1/2 pomegranate, seeds scooped
1/2 cup walnuts or pecan halves

Dressing
3 tbsp. olive oil

2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 tsp. pepper
10 oz. dried apples
2 golden delicious apples, finely chopped
1/2 cup honey
1 4 cup apple juice
1/4 cup soya sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Place chicken pieces in baking pan and sprinkle with spices. Layer dry and fresh apples on top of chicken. Combine honey, apple juice and soya sauce and pour over chicken pieces. Bake for 1-1/2 hours uncovered.

ROSH HASHANAH BRISKET

3 1/2- to 4-lb. brisket
1 can jellied cranberry sauce
3 tbsp. powdered onion soup mix

Mix the can of cranberry sauce with 3 tbsp. onion soup mix and add a cup of water to the mixture. Smear the mixture all over the brisket. Cover and cook for approximately 2-1/2 to 3 hours.

After-school fun snacks kids can help prepare

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Hearing "I'm hungry. What can I have to eat?" as the kids come home from school is enough to make any parent take a second look at what's in the fridge and the pantry.

The challenge is finding foods for the kids that are nutritious and delicious, easy to make and won't break the bank. All children (regardless of age or gender), benefit from spending time in the kitchen. Not only is it fun time with the parent, but with the younger kids, it can help reinforce math skills, reading and comprehension skills, the spirit of co-operation with siblings, and sometimes even a smidgen of chemistry.

My cooking with kids rules are simple:

- No fast food, not too much sugar, and more importantly, snacks shouldn't take longer to make than they do to eat.
- Invention makes everything taste better so encourage the kids to experiment after they've got the original recipe down pat.
- Try not to have them make snacks that require forks and or knives. It's a proven kid fact that anything eaten with fingers tastes better. Spoons for some reason seem to be OK with most kids.
- Try to keep basic ingredients, such as fresh fruit, grated cheeses or cold cuts, to pair with low-fat baked chips, tortilla wraps or pita bread for microwavable snacks, and rice cakes, granola bars or nuts for instant snacks.

BANANA FRUIT AMBROSIA

1 to 2 medium bananas, sliced
8-oz. can unsweetened pineapple tidbits, drained
1 large pear, peeled and diced
1/2 cup small seedless grapes
1/4 cup dark or golden raisins or diced dried apricots
1/4 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips, optional
16 oz. (2 cups) vanilla low-fat yogurt

Place all the ingredients except the yogurt into separate, small bowls. Divide the yogurt among 4 to 6 individual serving bowls and let the kids add whatever they like to each bowl.

PEANUT BUTTER MUFFINS

2 eggs
1 cup milk
1-4 cup banana (about 1 banana), mashed with a fork
1/4 cup peanut butter
1/3 cup oil
1/4 cup frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed
1/4 cup non-fat dry milk
2 1/4 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
nonstick spray

Preheat oven to 350. In a small bowl, beat the eggs and then add the milk, mashed banana, peanut butter, oil, apple juice, dry milk. Mix until combined and creamy. Add the flour, baking powder, and baking soda. Mix again.

Line a muffin tin with paper liners or lightly spray with nonstick spray. Spoon in the muffin mix. Fill each muffin cup about 2/3 full. Bake for about 15 minutes. Remove from muffin tin and cool on a wire rack. Makes 12.

Bat mitzvah girl gives gift of dance to Sderot kids

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

When 12-year-old Yael Matlow entered the new dance studio in the Sderot Community Center, she was greeted by a group of girls chanting "Yael, Yael!" enthusiastically. They were cheering for her because without Yael there wouldn't be a new studio to speak of.

"I love this new room!" exclaimed nine-year-old dancer Lotem Bukbuk. "It's much more beautiful than the old room."

"Dancing is my favourite thing to do," piped in nine-year-old Tal Shitreet.

"Thank you, Yael!" added eight-year-old Opal Cohen.

The girls are among about 100 dance students at the new Sderot Community Center aged five to 18, who, until the establishment of Yael's fortified studio were relegated to practising in the first-floor studio, which was not protected against Qassam rockets and took a direct hit from one on May 27, 2007.

"I will never forget that day. It was a trauma. I just thank God that it happened at 6:30 in the morning when no one is here and not at 6:30 in the evening when the centre is full of children," recalls Avi Sulimany, centre's director.

Sulimany presented Yael with a chanukiyah and Hamsa to thank her for her thoughtfulness and generosity.

"Today is like a holiday for me, a great celebration. It is the fulfilment of a dream to have a studio like this, where after so many years of tension, kids can come every day and act freely and learn and play and be safe without fear," Sulimany says.

She adds that the new studio will enable the centre to accommodate twice as many dance students as before – they now number some 250 altogether.

The new dance studio is part of a larger project being funded by all the Jewish federations across Canada via the Israel Emergency Campaign (IEC), which was launched in the summer of 2006 in response to the Second Lebanon War. Executed by the United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIAC), better known in Israel as Magbit Canada, the goal was to add a second floor to the centre and protect the entire structure from rocket attacks. The expanded and improved centre, the only protected community space of its kind in Sderot, will officially open in September.

But without the help of Yael, the newly-fortified building may not have included a new dance facility. In lieu of gifts for her bat mitzvah, which took place in Beit Shmuel on Dec. 29, 2008, she requested that her guests make a donation to "Yael's Friendship Fund" to help kids in Sderot. She managed to raise $25,000 to finance the construction of the new studio.

"I saw my friends getting gifts for their bat mitzvahs like bracelets and necklaces, and I don't really care about that. I don't really want five new pairs of earrings," says Yael, a student at United Synagogue Day School for whom the dedication trip marked her 12th excursion to Israel.

"I wanted to help people that are less fortunate than me. I wanted to help the kids of Sderot who live in danger. They don't know when it will be safe to play outside, as all kids should be able to do. I wanted to help them so that they could have a real childhood and have fun," she says.

Having already travelled to Sderot once with her family last August, Yael got a taste for what life was like there. "The first time I was in Sderot it was really nice, but it was also scary," she says, explaining that their tour guide had warned them to open their car windows and remove their seatbelts so that they could hear rocket sirens and respond quickly to them by pulling over and running to the nearest shelter. "I can't imagine living in fear like that every day."

A dancer herself since age five, Yael says she can't imagine a life without dance. "I love to dance, and I wanted to help others who love to dance," says Yael, who studies tap, jazz, hip hop, lyrical, ballet and musical theatre. "I dance with girls of all ages and all backgrounds, and it doesn't really matter when you're on stage because everybody is just having fun together."

In addition to raising money to establish the studio in Sderot, Yael collected donations of dance costumes, shoes and other gear, both from her studio and others in Toronto. When she came to Israel for her bat mitzvah, she brought five large duffel bags, all of them stuffed to the brim. Originally, she intended to deliver the bags personally to the studio in Sderot the day after her bat mitzvah, but was unable to because of the outbreak of war in Gaza. They were delivered by taxi instead.

Since she couldn't make it to Sderot in December, the UIAC arranged for her to meet a group of kids from Sderot who were travelling though Jerusalem. "It was really nice to meet them," Yael says of the group.

"It was nice because I knew I was helping them even if they didn't go to the dance studio, since the whole community centre is a safe place to go."

The idea for funding the studio came from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which for the last four years has run an initiative dubbed the B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy Program, which encourages teens to use their bar and bat mitvahs to make a philanthropic contribution to a project that is meaningful to them.

The Toronto federation is the first of four Jewish communities to establish the program. More than 100 bar and bat mitzvah youth have opened personal endowment funds at the Toronto federation, collectively representing more than 150,000 philanthropic dollars. The young philanthropists have chosen to dedicate their bar and bat mitzvah gifts to causes in both Israel and Toronto, among them helping needy kids get computers, summer camp tuition and the funds necessary to participate in extracurricular activities.

The funds, opened with a minimum $1,000 investment, can be replenished at any time. Annually, the federation holds a meeting at which they present the young philanthropists with several charitable options to which they may apply their funds' annual income.

"We also encourage them to come with their own ideas and interests," says Angela D'Aversa, assistant director of the Toronto federation and head of the B'nai Tzedek program.

"The idea is to walk teens through a learning process so that they will know how to make educated philanthropic decisions, empower them to realize that they really can make a difference, get them connected to the Jewish community and get them into the habit of tzedakah. The B'nai Tzedek program opens up the door to a lifetime of giving."

In addition to annual dedication meetings, the B'nai Tzedek program includes a hands-on volunteer component. "It's not just about dollars," says D'Aversa. "It's about seeing first-hand the impact that their contributions have. It's about engaging youth, educating them and encouraging them. Our goal is that they will be our future leaders and we have no doubt that they will be."

Yael's sister Orli, 15, who, through the same program, established the $25,000 Orli Sunshine Fund on her bat mitzvah on March 11, 2006, can testify to the importance of witnessing the impact of her charitable contribution.

She was thrilled to return to Israel to visit her project, a park in Kiryat Shmona that had been levelled during the Second Lebanon War.

"I always enjoyed places of community where I could have fun with kids my own age, so I decided to build the park," says Orli, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

The funds Orli raised went to the replanting of grass and trees, the construction of bike and rollerblade paths, a fountain and a large jungle gym. "It gives me so much pleasure to see kids playing there," she says.

Yael agrees. "It feels really good to give," she says, "and to know that I have done something to make [the children of Sderot's] lives easier and more fun."

More Yemeni Jews move to Israel amid Islamist fervour

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Three more Jewish families will leave Yemen for Israel this week, according to a Yemeni rabbi who laments the dwindling of an ancient community unnerved by threats and by the murder of a Jew last year.

A Shiite revolt in the strongly tribal northern mountains and the growth of Sunni Islamist fervour in Yemen have made Jews uncomfortable in a land where they have deep roots.

Only 200 to 300 Jews still live among Yemen's 23 million Muslims, mostly in the north.

Rabbi Yahya Yusuf Musa, 31, told Reuters the three families were from Raida, a town about 70 kilometres north of the capital Sanaa, where a Jew was killed in December by a Muslim compatriot who has been sentenced to death for the crime.

Sixteen Yemeni Jews from Raidah moved to Israel in June, including relatives of the victim, Mashaa Yaeesh al-Nahari.

An official at Israel's immigration ministry declined to comment due to the sensitivity of the subject.

Israel organized the departure of about 50,000 Jews, the bulk of a once-vibrant minority famed for its craftsmen, to the newly created Jewish state in 1949.

Last year, Rabbi Musa was among 67 Jews forced to leave the village of Al Salem in the northern province of Saada after threats by Shiite rebels known as Houthis, whose intermittent five-year-old revolt flared again this month.

> 'Their concern and fears increased day by day'

"The Houthis kicked us out," Rabbi Musa said, recounting attacks on property, theft of religious books and other abuses. "They gave us 10 days to leave, or they would kidnap and kill us."

Evacuated to Saada city and then flown by helicopter to Sanaa, the Jews of Al Salem now live in government-supplied housing with a small monthly stipend and food rations.

The government accuses rebels, led by Abdel-Malek al-Houthi, of seeking to restore Islamic rule by the Zaydi imamate, which was overthrown in 1962. Zaydis, which belong to a branch of Shia, are a minority in mainly Sunni Muslim Yemen.

Rabbi Musa, who works as a silversmith, said the 15 families from Al Salem felt secure in Sanaa, unlike their counterparts in Raida. Their children go to school and play with young Muslims.

"We have no intention of leaving the country, because our birthplace is beloved," he said when asked if they planned to go to Israel. "We prefer to live in safety and security in Sanaa."

Rabbi Musa said President Ali Abdullah Saleh had looked after the Jews from Al Salem, but said his promise to transfer them from Amran province, where Raida is located, had not worked out.

"Their concern and fears increased day by day. This forced them to leave the country, because they had no other option."

Saleh's government is publicly supportive of the remaining Jews, as is the main Islamist opposition party, Islah.

"The Yemeni Jews are citizens. They should have their own life as Yemenis," said Mohammed al-Sadi, the party's assistant secretary-general. "I prefer for them to stay in Yemen, not move to another country, because they are part of this society."

But the tiny Jewish remnant faces an uncertain future.

"If there is deterrent action against those who threaten the Jews, then even those who migrated would be ready to return," said Rabbi Musa. "As for those who are left, if there is security for themselves, for their families, for their possessions, they would have no reason to leave their homeland."

Sweden refuses to condemn IDF organ harvest story

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday called for the Swedish government to condemn the recent article in a Stockholm newspaper that alleged Israel Defence Forces troops harvested the organs of Palestinians they killed.

An official said that Netanyahu told the cabinet he didn't expect the Swedish government to apologize for the article in the evening tabloid Aftonbladet, but he did expect it to take a stand.

"We're not asking the Swedish government for an apology, we're asking for their condemnation," the official quoted Netanyahu as saying.

The prime minister added that the story was "reminiscent of medieval libels that Jews killed Christian children for their blood," the official said.

Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt has already rejected Israeli calls for an official condemnation.

The article that appeared earlier this month in Sweden's biggest-selling newspaper enraged Israeli officials, who called it blatantly racist and said it reinforced vile anti-Semitic themes. It has sparked widespread fierce debate both in Sweden and abroad.

The article claimed that as far back as 1992, the IDF was taking organs from Palestinian youths it killed, and it also mentions an ongoing U.S. criminal investigation involving members of the American Jewish community.

Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak was said to be considering a libel lawsuit against the writer of the article.

Some in Jerusalem expressed satisfaction over an entry in Bildt's personal blog of Sweden's foreign minister, which led some here to believe the official stance in Stockholm had softened.

Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz strongly criticized the Swedish government on Sunday, saying that its silence in face of the Aftonbladet article charging IDF soldiers with harvesting organs from dead Palestinians is tantamount to a diplomatic crisis.

"Anyone who is unwilling to condemn such a blood libel could be considered unwanted in Israel," Steinitz said.

The finance minister added that the "Swedish government cannot remain indifferent, and the crisis will remain until Sweden responds in a different manner."

"Israel cannot ignore such a manifestation of anti-Semitism," Steinitz said.

Meanwhile, the Government Press Office (GPO) said Sunday that it would delay accrediting staff members of a Swedish newspaper that published the article.

GPO head Danny Seaman said that "we have 90 days to look into the request for accreditation and we will conduct as thorough a probe as possible," adding that "in the case of this newspaper, we will look into even the most insignificant bureaucratic detail."

Seaman added that the GPO "has dealt with people impersonating reporters in order to get into Gaza in the past, so we have passed their information to the IDF so that forces on the ground can be aware of their presence."

In his personal blog, Bildt suggests that articles like the one in Aftonbladet may lead to hate crimes motivated by anti-Semitism.

Over the weekend, Israel stepped up pressure on Sweden by relaying sharply worded messages via various channels, insisting the government there issue an official condemnation of the article.

The pressure involved efforts by the Foreign Ministry, the Prime Minister's Office and National Security Adviser Uzi Arad, who called Bildt over the weekend.

A political source in Jerusalem told Ha'aretz that even though Arad and Bildt have known each other for some time and both have participated in the Atlantic Forum discussions, the conversation was unpleasant.

Arad described the article as "abominable" and protested the fact the Swedish government didn't support the condemnation issued by its ambassador to Israel last week.

"The article is a blood libel of the worst sort," Arad told Bildt. "The absence of your response reflects a lack of sensitivity toward every Israeli, irrespective of political views. I expect you to forcefully condemn these claims."

Last Friday, Israel's ambassador to Sweden, Benny Dagan, in a meeting with Sweden's state secretary for foreign affairs, Frank Belfrage, demanded that Sweden "lift this cloud over ties prior to the visit of Foreign Minister Carl Bildt to Israel."

Bildt is slated to visit Israel on Sept. 10.

The meeting between Dagan and Belfrage was tense, with Dagan being highly critical of the Swedish government and especially Bildt, reiterating Israel's demand for an official condemnation of the article's claims. The Swedish state secretary argued there are constitutional limitations to what the government can do, and that it's impossible to limit what's published in the media.

Belfrage tried to explain that Bildt had responded on the matter in his blog. The Swedish foreign minister wrote in his blog last Friday that "freedom of speech is a basic value in Sweden" and "part of the constitution." Bildt noted that he was cognizant of the anger in Israel but believed the basic values of a society are best preserved through debate.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt

Israeli Finance Minister Yuval Steinitz

In response, Dagan said: "What does it mean he wrote in his blog? Who does that represent? Is he writing there as a private citizen? As the foreign minister of Sweden? Or as the current holder of the European Union presidency? Israel expects a clear government stance and not views on a blog."

As a result of the pressure, Bildt posted the new blog entry, in which he voices views condemning anti-Semitism and calls for closer ties with Israel.

In an unprecedented move, the Swedish foreign Ministry's website included a link to Bildt's blog entry, suggesting that his position was being adopted as the semi-official stance of the government. In his new entry, Bildt expressed his personal reservations about the article, but didn't condemn it and said freedom of the press is defended by the Swedish constitution. However, he also hints that reports can stir anti-Semitism and that this "angers" him.

The Swedish foreign minister said hate crimes are against the law in Sweden, and this includes incitement to anti-Semitism. But he also noted that the courts, and not politicians, are responsible for condemning and dealing with the responsible parties.

Israel's Foreign Ministry and the Prime Minister's Office welcomed the "change" in the foreign minister's blog.

"Better late than never," a senior Israel official said. "The Swedes are beginning to move in the right direction, but from our point of view this is not the end of the crisis, and Israel is still demanding a clear statement on the part of the government in Stockholm."

Compounding the outrage surrounding the publication of the article, the Swedish government last week distanced itself from a statement by its ambassador to Israel in which she criticized the article, saying that "the condemnation was solely the judgment of the embassy [in Tel Aviv], and designed for an Israeli audience." The comments came in a statement released by the Swedish foreign ministry.

Ambassador Elisabet Borsiin Bonnier had written that "The article in the Swedish newspaper Aftonbladet is as shocking and appalling to us Swedes, as it is to Israeli citizens.

"Just as in Israel, freedom of the press prevails in Sweden," Bonnier said. "However, freedom of the press and freedom of expression are freedoms which carry a certain responsibility."

After the condemnation of the Aftonbladet article, the editor of the paper, Jan Helin, lashed out at both Israel and at the Swedish envoy for attacking his paper's coverage.

"It's deeply unpleasant and sad to see such a strong propaganda machine using centuries-old anti-Semitic images in an apparent attempt to get an obviously topical issue off the table," Helin said.

He accused the Swedish ambassador of "a flagrant assault on freedom of speech" for her criticisms.

Helin called the article an opinion piece raising questions of Israel in the context of a suspected link in Israel to a New Jersey crime case. He denied any suggestion of anti-Semitism from his paper.

Donald Boström, the Swedish journalist whose article accused IDF soldiers of killing Palestinians to obtain their organs, denied that he was motivated by anti-Semitism.

"I'm very sad to hear people accuse me of anti-Semitism," Boström told Ha'aretz.

Aftonbladet ran Boström's piece under the headline, "They plunder the organs of our sons."

"Now that [the story] has once again risen to the surface," Boström said, "I wanted to point out the link [to the New Jersey affair] and the fact that there needs to be an investigation of the claims."

Boström said he had offered the story to another Swedish newspaper, Dagens Nyheter, which turned it down "with no explanation."

Asa Linderborg, an editor of the newspaper's culture section which printed the story, told Ha'aretz that the publication "stands behind the demand for an international inquiry."

"We had many discussions on whether to publish the article or not, and to the best of my knowledge, there are no facts there that are incorrect," Linderborg said.

After the story's publication, the Israeli embassy in Stockholm sent a sternly worded diplomatic protest to the Swedish government. A spokesperson for the Foreign Ministry called the article anti-Semitic "hate porn".

"This article has clear elements of medieval blood libels against Jews," spokesperson Yigal Palmor said. Accusing the tabloid of encouraging hate crimes, he said: "This is intolerable."

Palmor said the newspaper's decision to publish the story is "a mark of disgrace" for the Swedish press. "In a democratic country, there should be no place for dark blood libels out of the Middle Ages of this type," Palmor said. "This is an article that shames Swedish democracy and the entire Swedish press."

Sydsvenskan, southern Sweden's major daily, had harsh criticism for Aftonbladet. It published an opinion piece under the headline "Antisemitbladet" (a play on the name Aftonbladet).

"We have heard the story before, in one form or the other. It follows the traditional pattern of conspiracy theory: a great number of loose threads that the theorist tempts the reader to tie into a neat knot without having been provided with any proven connection whatsoever," wrote columnist Mats Skogkär.

"Whispers in the dark. Anonymous sources. Rumours. That is all it takes. After all we all know what they [the Jews] are like, don't we: inhuman, hardened. Capable of anything," he wrote. "Now all that remains is the defence, equally predictable: 'Anti-Semitism.' No, no, just criticism of Israel."

Lena Posner, president of the Official Council of Jewish Communities in Sweden, said Sunday that Israel's demand that Sweden officially condemn the article that accused Israel Defence Forces of harvesting Palestinian organs "had blown the issue completely out of proportion.

"No one even noticed the article – which is, incidentally, anti-Semitic and absolutely untruthful – when it was buried in the last pages of Aftonbladet," Posner said. "But the Israeli response pushed the journalist who wrote it, Daniel Bostrom, to the front of the stage and into the heart of the Swedish mainstream."

"What's even worse is that by making the preposterous demand for a government condemnation, the debate has changed from anti-Semitism to freedom of speech in Sweden. Instead of concentrating on debunking the story, they have made it a freedom of speech issue. The government is not going to condemn the article – freedom of speech here is sacrosanct," added Posner, who said she could see how the Swedish mainstream media, which at first attacked the tabloid for printing the piece, were now supporting it, based on the principle of preserving the freedom of speech.

Put some peace in your tank

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

TEL AVIV — A new factory brokered by three peace foundations will transform biomass waste from farm land into biofuel.

The joint Israeli-Jordanian-Palestinian biofuel project will alleviate thousands of tons of organic waste and produce one million barrels of biofuel, powering peace in the Middle East.

It's the kind of project that should bring a smile to the face of every leader in the Middle East: a true regional partnership, brokered by three peace foundations, that is about to reduce biomass pollution for Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians.

Oren Blonder

Even better, it will transform biomass waste into biofuel so that farmers and industrialists can turn a profit while simultaneously creating much-needed jobs in the region.

The idea was initiated by the Peres Center for Peace at an annual conference in Germany the Jordanian-Israeli Forum on Economic Cooperation in 2008. A joint Jordanian-Israeli company, MME New Diesel Company, with technology supplied by a German company, will run the biofuel initiative.

It will alleviate an excess of plant-derived biomass buildup in three regions: Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian Authority, and will create fuel to literally power Middle East peace.

In addition to the Peres Center, the project's partners include the Wittenberg Center for Global Ethics and the Amman Center for Peace and Development.

According to organizers, the new pilot facility to be built in Israel in the northern part of the Arava Desert is strategically located to serve the three communities.

It will be built to produce one million barrels of biofuel, while alleviating thousands of tons of dry organic waste. It will be a closed system, so no emissions or pollution will emanate from the plant, which will also be self-powered.

Oren Blonder of the Peres Center's Agriculture, Water and Environment Department tells ISRAEL21c: "In this region, agriculture waste is a huge problem. It comes from food crops, from orchards and from pruning leaves and trees. [Where land is limited] it's a big problem for the entire region – for Israel, for Palestine and for Jordan."

While biofuel is an attractive source of alternate energy, there is also a dilemma involved in growing crops specifically for biofuel. It requires the conversion of large swaths of land to grow the crops, and that can lead to steep rises in the costs of agricultural products and severe food crises in basic crops such as rice and wheat.

"We at the Peres Center are aware of the sensitivities to first-generation bio-diesel, which is in direct competition with food. As a policy we never deal with first-generation biofuels. The new company will produce second-generation biofuels, taking two environmental problems to create a solution," Blonder explains.

To solve the problem locally without causing a new problem, the Peres Center decided to jumpstart this new initiative and help create a solution for the entire region, and not just one that would be in the business interests of a single company.

And so, MME-IL was formed, with Ilan Friedlander as the Israeli CEO. Due to escalating political tensions in Jordan, with a population that is about 70 per cent Palestinian, the Jordanian partners have asked to remain anonymous in order to avoid persecution.

The business aspect is an important part of the peace formula, says Blonder. "Business-to-business creates job opportunities for both sides to help promote peace. And it's a pure private enterprise – we at the Peres Center don't have anything to do with the company – we just helped raise funds from government sources."

All of the peace projects that the Agriculture, Water and Environment Department of the Peres Center takes under its wing have a similar flavour. Like its namesake, Israeli President Shimon Peres, the Peres Center seeks to advance peace by bringing together Arabs and Israelis from various spheres.

"We met and decided to establish a joint company – MME-IL – and helped introduce partners to raise the needed finances," Blonder says.

The impact of the project will be felt far and wide, by individual farmers, agricultural co-operatives, regional organizations and, ultimately, by the local populations.

"As far as I know, it's meant to be for two or three years as a pilot project that will produce about one million barrels of biofuel. That's the goal," says Blonder, noting that the profits will be shared equally among the business partners from Israel and Jordan.

The Palestinians won't be business partners in MME, but their farmers will benefit from a new source of income, as they will now be able to sell agricultural waste to the plant rather than burning it, which has been the local tradition so far.

"The company will buy waste from farmers from the entire region. The idea is not specifically [to help the] Palestinians but to create a new source of energy," Blonder says.

"This is going to give an answer to the environment problem," asserts Blonder, who will hold a workshop on the project at the upcoming WATEC water conference in Tel Aviv in November.

This new source of energy will be one that comprises layers of peace, trust, understanding and environmental and financial gain. Imagine how your car could run on that.

AMIA wanted man now defence minister

JTA

TEHRAN — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad nominated as his defence minister a man wanted in the 1994 AMIA bombing.

Ahmad Vahidi is one of five Iranians wanted by Argentinian authorities for planning the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, which killed 85 people.

Ahmadinejad, whose June 12 re-election as president is widely seen as rigged, submitted his proposed cabinet for parliamentary approval last Thursday.

Reports suggest that some on the list might not pass muster; legislators have already intimated that they see Ahmadinejad as having made loyalty more of a priority than experience.

Women learn business

Deputy Foreign Minister Daniel Ayalon convened a special seminar last week for Israeli and Palestinian businesswomen. Entitled Women Making Business, the seminar was organized by MASHAV, Israel's National Agency for International Cooperation, in co-operation with the Israel-Palestine Chamber of Commerce, to train Palestinian women in the field of entrepreneurship. Ayalon told the participants that women have the power and the ability to influence and change society. Israelis and Palestinians can be partners not only in peace but also in economic development, Ayalon said.

Ya'alon rebuked

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu rebuked his vice premier, Moshe Ya'alon, for calling Peace Now "a virus." Ya'alon reportedly told the prime minister that his remarks were misinterpreted. "The remarks made by Minister Ya'alon are unacceptable ...and do not represent the government's stance," Netanyahu said in a statement. Ya'alon, who is Israel's Minister for Strategic Affairs, made the remarks during a meeting of the Likud's so-called Jewish Leadership faction, headed by Moshe Feiglin. Peace Now General Secretary Yariv Oppenheimer called Ya'alon's statements "dangerous." Ya'alon was IDF Chief of Staff from 2002 to 2005.

Dudu Topaz commits suicide

Dudu Topaz, an Israeli television star jailed for allegedly ordering attacks on local TV executives, committed suicide in his prison cell. Topaz, an Israeli talk show and game show host and star of variety and satire shows, hanged himself. He had been under a suicide watch since trying to kill himself shortly after he was arrested in June. He took his life with an electric cord in the shower stall next to his cell, the one place where there were no security cameras, according to reports. Topaz, 62, was once known as the "king of ratings." Israel's Prison Services said that it would investigate the suicide.

Doctors' numbers down

The number of doctors per capita in Israel is dropping to serious levels, according to a Health Ministry report. At the end of last year there were 3.5 doctors under the age of 65 per 1,000 people in Israel, compared with 3.7 per 1,000 at the end of 2000, according to the report. Israel has 33,051 licensed physicians, 25,542 under the age of 65. The report says in 2008, 606 new licenses to practice medicine were issued, compared to 898 in 2000. Fewer doctors are moving to Israel from the Diaspora, according to the report, which pointed out that the number of licenses issued to doctors of Eastern European origin has dipped to very low levels. Over the past five years, about half the new doctors were graduates of Israeli medical schools, compared with one-third in 2000, also reflecting the decline in the number of doctors making aliyah. At the end of 2008, some 43 per cent of new physicians were women, compared with 49 per cent in 2006 and 2007. Currently, 40 per cent of doctors in Israel are women. Israel has four medical schools. More than 1,000 Israelis reportedly are studying medicine at schools abroad.

Twelfth swine flu death

Israel recorded its 12th death related to swine flu. A four-year-old girl died in an Afula hospital last Thursday night. It was not clear if swine flu was the prevailing factor as the girl was suffering from other ailments, but it was a contributing factor, hospital officials said.

Boxing championship

An Israeli boxer will fight for a world championship for the first time. Yuri Foreman, undefeated in 27 professional bouts, will challenge super welterweight champion Daniel Santos for the World Boxing Association title. The fight is expected to take place Nov. 14 in Las Vegas. Foreman, 29, is fervently religious and is studying to become an Orthodox rabbi.

He was born in Belarus, and moved to Israel at age 9. He relocated to Brooklyn in 2001 to pursue boxing.

THE MAN BEHIND THE MUSIC

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Like many freshly minted university graduates, Daniel Seligman had no idea what to do with his degree.

After receiving a Bachelor of Arts in religious studies from McGill University, he took a part-time job at a pizzeria and started helping his brother Chris, who was the keyboard player in a band called Stars. But he had no plan to make it in the music business, let alone start one of the most successful music festivals in Canada.

Much to his own surprise, however, Seligman became the co-founder and organizer-in-chief of Pop Montreal, one of the city's hippest musical extravaganzas.

"A degree in religious studies doesn't really qualify me to do anything. And I didn't have any real intention of doing anything in the music business," said Seligman, 33, from the festival's Montreal office.

In a city that boasts an internationally renowned jazz festival, along with a yearlong roster of musical and cultural events, wedging in another big-league concert series is no small undertaking.

But since its founding, Pop Montreal has become a hub of the Montreal indie music scene, drawing bands from across Canada and beyond. This year it will include over 400 musical acts, along with a film festival, art exhibits, conference, and crafts fair.

Started by Seligman in 2002 together with fellow McGill graduate Noelle Sorbara and Halifax music impresario Peter Rowan, Pop Montreal takes place each fall at venues across town.

"It just sort of happened organically without a lot of forethought or foresight. Within the first seven or eight months we pulled off the first one, and since then it's been an ongoing process," said Seligman, who hatched the idea with Rowan during a train trip from Toronto to Montreal.

A Toronto native, Seligman attended Oakwood Collegiate Institute before moving to Montreal to go to university. In between, he took a year off to travel to Israel with Hashomer Hatzair youth group, working in Tel Aviv and on Kibbutz Ein Dor.

Only a few weeks after Seligman arrived in Tel Aviv, he attended the peace rally at which Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated.

"I was 19 years old, and all of a sudden I was in this really crazy life changing moment. I remember thinking it was like when Kennedy was assassinated – it had a really big impact on the rest of the experience," he said.

Back in Canada, Seligman pursued his studies at McGill, which included several Jewish studies courses. It was in a Yiddish literature class that he met Josh Dolgin, also known as SoCalled, a klezmer-influenced hip hop artist whose career Seligman now manages.

"I remember going to a show where he was performing, very, very early on, but we just kept in touch and when I had started the festival I asked him to perform. As an artist I find his music really interesting and really neat. He's a pretty dynamic individual who's fun to work with," Seligman said.

Through Dolgin, Seligman has also come into contact with other Jewish music performers, including Toronto's Beyond the Pale, and veteran lounge singer Irving Fields.

"I love the music and I definitely have an interest in klezmer music. Through Josh I've definitely discovered a lot of cool stuff," he said.

Over the years Seligman has managed a string of successful bands, starting with Stars, who gave him his start in the music business when they were working on their first album, Nightsongs, which was released in 2001. Other clients have included The Besnard Lakes, The Hot Springs, and Unicorns.

These days, however, Seligman prefers to stick with just one act and focus the rest of his energy on his festival.

"In terms of management I find it a lot of work. It's a 365 day job, so at the moment I'm not ready to do that," he said. "The last few artist have been bands, so you're balancing four or five egos instead of just one, so I prefer just one person. But the main thing is artistically – I never get bored or sick of seeing [Dolgin] perform."

Meanwhile, Pop Montreal continues putting on concerts and events at a brisk clip. Now in its eighth year, the festival has secured its place in the city's cultural landscape.

But despite its unexpected success, the scrappy outfit still has its share of difficulties. As is the case for many arts organizations, weathering the current economic downturn is a struggle.

Because of its low-key, do-it-yourself structure, however, Pop Montreal may be better suited to ride out the storm than some of its more top-heavy competitors.

"We try to stay positive. It's never been easy, but I think we're used to being relatively poor so we're kind of set up to do a bit with not a whole lot of money. We're always kind of scrounging and using our resources to the utmost," Seligman said.

Economic difficulties certainly don't seem to be slowing down this year's programming, which features the kind of eclectic line-up that has made the festival famous.

Pop Montreal's upcoming international 2009 Music Festival September 30, October 4.

In addition to a slew of chic indie acts and an even larger number of up-and-comers, Pop Montreal has earned a reputation for bringing long neglected legends back into the spotlight. In the past, artists such as Roky Erikson, Patty Smith and Burt Bacharach have performed at the festival, and this year's headliners include Brazilian tropicalia legends Os Mutantes, Krautrock pioneers Faust and First Nations singer-songwriter Buffy Sainte-Marie.

Whether Seligman's degree in religious studies had anything to do with founding Pop Montreal is questionable. But for the festival's thousands of attendees, its shows can be nothing less than a religious experience.

Pop Montreal takes place from Sept. 30 to Oct. 4. For more info visit www.popmontreal.com.

Summer Yiddish Concert: Efim Chorny and Socalled (Josh Dolgin), two of the leading young voices on the contemporary Yiddish music scene, come together this week for the Ashkenaz Foundation's Annual Summer Yiddish Concert.

Chorny, who is from Kishinev, Moldova, made an electrifying appearance at an Ashkenaz concert in Earl Bales Park in 2008. His soulful and powerful vocals have made him one of the most important protagonists in the revival of Jewish culture in the former Soviet Union.

Co-headlining the concert is Montreal's Socalled, a staunch devotee of traditional Yiddish music who is known for his innovative Yiddish hip-hop stylings. Other performers are Moldovan pianist Susanna Ghergus, clarinetist Kurt Bjorling and violinist Aleksandar Gajic.

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St. Monday, Aug. 31, 7:30 p.m. $10 at the door. The concert is being presented in association with the Beth Emeth, UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish, KlezKanada and sponsor David Sela. 416-979-9901, www.ashkenazfestival.com

Play About Genocide: Toronto author-playwright Michael Redhill's play Goodness, which was honoured with an award at the 2005 Edinburgh Festival, has been thoroughly reworked for an upcoming production at the Theatre Centre.

Co-produced by Volcano Theatre in partnership with the Tarragon Theatre, Goodness is "a multi-layered exploration of genocide laced with choral music from around the world."

The protagonist, Michael, is a Toronto Jewish playwright seeking answers to the slaughter of his great-grandparents and five of their children in the Holocaust. Through contact with a stranger in a London bar, he hears an astonishing tale of murder, war crimes and love. Unfolding as an intricate knot of flashbacks and time-shifting tales within tales, the play "explores what it means to tell, or even know, the truth, and who is able to tell the truth to another."

Michael Redhill

Goodness is directed by Ross Manson and features a six-person cast. It runs Sept. 15 through 27 at the Theatre Centre, 1087 Queen St. W. (www.volcano.ca, 416-538-0988). Afterward the production travels to Rwanda for performance as part of 15th anniversary commemorations of the genocide there.

Redhill is the award-winning author of two collections of poetry, the play Building Jerusalem and the acclaimed novels Martin Sloan and Consolation.

Names in the News: Israeli tourism minister Noaz Bar Nir recently approached Leonard Cohen (via his concert producer) with the suggestion that the famed Canadian singer-poet perform a concert in Nazareth in addition to the one he is scheduled to perform at the Ramat Gan Stadium on Sept. 24 as the final concert in a world tour.

The Ramat Gan concert, which is being billed as "a concert for reconciliation, tolerance and peace," was quickly sold out after tickets went on sale. Cohen reportedly wanted to play an additional concert in Ramallah, but for a variety of reasons it could not be arranged. Bar Nir suggested Nazareth as an alternative because it is Israel's largest Arab city and home to a 40,000-capacity outdoor amphitheatre specially built for the recent visit of the Pope. No word yet on whether Cohen has agreed to the suggestion.

Comedians mine experiences as 'underdogs' for hit show

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Isaac Kessler knows better than perhaps anyone else that you can get something from nothing – it just takes years of practice.

The 25-year-old comedian has been performing all over Toronto during the past few years, most recently at the Fringe Festival in July, where he and his partner, Ken Hall, effortlessly pulled off the debut of their hit two-man improv musical comedy, 2-Man No-Show.

Kessler and Hall's show includes many pop culture references – some obvious, others more obscure. Movie buffs will be able to spot references to Rocky, Mad Max, Jurassic Park, Mary Poppins, Total Recall and Dirty Dancing. The easily offended should also take heed: 2-Man No-Show is about as "un-PC" as it gets, featuring a song and dance number about Jews and scoliosis and a pantomime bit featuring coitus with a chair.

It wasn't always this easy for Kessler, though; as he tells it, it took him a while to figure out where he was going, both in his life and with the show.

A few years ago, Kessler had been studying information technology part time at York University, but the course work was always second to his extracurricular activities. In second year, Kessler got involved with Hillel and became its sports director and later its social chair, positions that made him a name on campus.

In his third and fourth years, he began taking music classes. He focused on percussion instruments such as the West African samba drum, and he frequently performed at festivals around campus.

But it was when he signed up for acting for non-majors at York that Kessler says he "got my first taste of improv."

But still not ready for a major commitment to performing, Kessler needed to be encouraged by his older brother, Jacob, to take classes at Second City, which he finally did in the evenings after school. After completing the five requisite levels – consisting of 80 classes in total – Kessler was accepted to Second City's conservatory program for graduates, where he met Hall.

In the summer of 2007, he began taking long-form improv at Bad Dog Theatre and the Impatient Theatre, which he describes as being his first real foray into the world of professional improv.

Film pays tribute to two gifted American songwriters

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"So many people know the songs, but not the boys," observes singer-actress Julie Andrews in a defining comment, referring to Robert and Richard Sherman, whose simple, singable, sunny songs rarely fail to touch the heart.

Andrews' remarks occur in the opening moments of The Boys: The Sherman Brothers' Story, which is currently playing in Toronto theatres.

This illuminating and entertaining documentary pays tribute to two sometimes unheralded men who wrote more movie musical scores than anyone else in the history of film.

"Can you believe the output of those gentlemen?" asks Dick Van Dyke, the actor and comedian who had starring roles in movies in which their memorable songs were featured.

In a highly productive partnership spanning five decades, the Shermans produced the scores for, among other motion pictures, Mary Poppins, Chitty Chitty Bang Bang, The Parent Trap, The Jungle Book, The Aristocats, Charlotte's Web, Winnie the Pooh and An American Tail.

They also wrote iconic pop songs – You're Sixteen and Pineapple Princess – and the hummable theme song for the 1964 New York World's Fair, It's a Small World (after all), which may be their best-known song.

Earning nine Academy Award nominations, the Shermans won two Oscars for Mary Poppins, two of whose signature songs are Supercalifragilisticexpialidocious and Chim Chim Cher-ee.

Yet The Boys is not just about an astonishingly successful songwriting team, but also about a fraught relationship. Although the Shermans are synonymous with the eternally optimistic songs they composed for Walt Disney, they had a serious problem getting along.

Call it a case of sibling rivalry.

As kids, they rarely spoke, and as adults, they did not socialize.

The brothers lived only seven blocks apart in Los Angeles, but their families were like strangers. At movie premières, they never mingled, and when the patriarch of the family, Al Sherman, died, the brothers opted for two separate shivahs.

Indeed, the directors of The Boys, Gregory Sherman and Jeffrey Sherman, the sons of the brothers, had no contact whatsoever for 40 years until they decided to make this documentary in honour of their fathers.

Different lifestyles and clashing interests broadly account for this dysfuntional situation. Beyond revealing that the Shermans did not enjoy each other's company, and that their wives were incompatible, the directors leave viewers pretty much in the dark about their contentious relationship. Too much is thus left to the imagination.

Paradoxically enough, the mutual animosity paid career dividends. "The crucible of creativity of these guys was conflict," explains Disney's biographer. "Somewhere in their songs they do meet."

Born in New York City, they were the sons of Al Sherman, a Tin Pan Alley songwriter whose father, Samuel, a concertmaster and composer in the royal court of the Austro-Hungarian Empire emperor, immigrated to the United States in 1909.

Al's songs, including his hits Potatoes Are Cheaper, You Gotta Be a Football Hero and Now's the Time to Fall in Love, were recorded by the finest performers: Benny Goodman, Billie Holiday, Frank Sinatra, Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Peggy Lee, Patti Page and Bing Crosby.

Al encouraged Robert and Richard to collaborate, and their first song, Gold Can Buy You Anything (but love), sung by Gene Autry, proved to be popular.

But it was not until they landed a gig with Disney – supposedly the only songwriters who were ever on contract with him – that their star rose. "They were paying us money to write songs," says Robert effusively. "I couldn't believe it."

Disney was a generally remote figure, but he liked the Shermans, admired their talents and developed a special bond with them. Disney's nephew, Roy, who appears in The Boys, says, "They could write a song over lunch hour."

After Disney's untimely death, the assignments dried up, and the brothers had to fend for themselves. The Boys does not delve into that disruptive period, nor does it elaborate on Robert's singular trauma. As a soldier in the U.S. army in World War II, he was one of the liberators of the Dachau concentration camp in Germany. The things he saw in Dachau left a deep impression and caused him a nervous breakdown after the war. "The horror lasted a long time," Robert muses.

Regrettably, The Boys does not go into details, nor are we told how this experience affected him as a songwriter.

Despite such glaring gaps, The Boys is a credible film about two amazing brothers.

Improv bits impress the reviewers

"For me, that was the kicker," Kessler says. "When I got there, I was like, 'This is improv, man, this is what it's really all about… I want to get into this thing.'"

Last year, he performed at a comedy festival in Melbourne, Australia, on an invitation from fellow comedian Peter Morley, where he ended up performing 15 sketch shows. Kessler was recently in Chicago for the iO Chicago Theater intensive comedy program.

The 2-Man No-Show concept came out of a bit of a dare from Morley, who urged Kessler to apply for the Toronto Fringe Festival, which he did, along with Hall. The festival holds a draw each year to select participants.

Kessler says he was surprised when he heard their names come up, but then realized their act was a bit short on content.

"People spend years and years writing plays to go into Fringe and don't get accepted. So we hear our number and we're like, 'Oh my God, we have nothing. We don't even have a show name.' And so we just said, 'Uh-oh, well, we're in for a ride now – let's go,'" he says.

"And that's why 2-Man No-Show is a very fitting name, because we really had no show at all when we applied."

The show's format may be scattershot, but Kessler says that the underlying theme remains intact throughout, as it was born out of the personal experiences of both actors.

"Our show is about the underdog," he says. "Ken's got scoliosis [curvature of the spine], so he's had a hard life. I had a rough time at USDS [United Synagogue Day School]. I went there from senior kindergarten to Grade 8. I came out of there with zero friends. I got made fun of and stuff – it was brutal. So we've all had our ups and downs and been the underdogs."

Kessler was concerned about what reviewers were going to write about the aimless, meandering style of the show, but, as it turns out, his worries were unfounded: critics fell in love with the performance, giving it rave reviews in publications such as Eye Weekly and Now magazine.

Kessler says that one of things the reviewers seemed most impressed with were the duo's improv bits, which they mistook for scripted lines.

"In one of the reviews, they mentioned something that was improvised that night and they thought that it was part of the actual show, which is actually not the case. So, it's awesome how that kind of stuff works out."

Kessler has also gotten the occasional rave from an audience member, usually who is under the same misconception as the critics.

"I had a guy walk up to me [after] Ken dropped a line on Tuesday's show, and [he said], 'Oh man, that line's hilarious' and I'm like, 'Ken made that up that night, on the spot,'" Kessler says.

"So you never really know what the dialogue is going to be like within those segments. We know what beats we have to hit, but we never know what's going to happen. It's different every night."

Stratford meditations on love

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

It is probably true to say that no subject has stirred the soul or inspired the hearts of writers, poets, playwrights, composers, lyricists and artists more than the subject of love. The pursuit of love – in all its imagined forms – has probably been the single most compelling literary, if not also personal, preoccupation of men and women, young and old, rich and poor, across all time, place and culture. Is there any age of mankind or stage of life at which the idea of perfect love – sweet, pure, generous, everlasting – does not evoke a smile or a sigh?

To be sure, every culture has its own ways of easing love's burdens or of laughing at love's misadventures or of grounding love's airy loftiness in real life's more pragmatic, earthy details. Yiddish-language culture for example is quite piquant in this regard. "Love is sweet, but tastes best with bread," the wise but poor housewife knows. Or as the observant wiseacre said of the fawning young couple, "They are madly in love – he with himself, she with herself."

Love is indeed one of life's most dramatic motivators.

The playbill this year at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival offers us wide, delightful, convincing proof of that. Three of its plays in particular provide very different views of love.

A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum features the naïve infatuation and puppy love of teenagers. West Side Story, a modernized adaptation of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, is a tale of the urgent, passionate, desperate love of youth. Cyrano de Bergerac is a moving paean to idealized, self-sacrificing, romantic love.

Each of the plays is unlike the other. Yet each is masterful entertainment.

Forum is an uproarious romp of mischief and mayhem. The fortuitous collaboration of Burt Shevelove and Larry Gelbart, who wrote the book, and Stephen Sondheim, who wrote the music, the play first appeared on Broadway in 1962. It is a throwback to the days of vaudeville and burlesque, combining a racy story with multi-layered, twisting turns of an outlandishly impossible plot.

The story has an uncomplicated core. The young, inexperienced Hero has fallen in love with the concubine next door, Philia. Hero promises to grant freedom to his slave, Pseudolus, if the slave will somehow arrange the acquisition of the young girl. Hero's parents leave for the weekend and Pseudolus sets to work trying to secure his own freedom by conniving the purchase of Philia. But unknown to Pseudolus, Philia has already been sold to a self-adoring, macho Roman warrior, Miles Gloriosus. But the prospect of freedom is too strong an incentive for the undauntable slave who embroils everyone in his hilariously tangled web.

From the very opening ensemble musical number, A Comedy Tonight, the audience knows it is in for roll-licking, frolicking, sassy fun. The music is bold, the slapstick is perfectly executed, and the comedy is a fast-paced, amusing blast of fine farce and fancy. Bruce Dow as Pseudolus is superb. Stephen Ouimette as Hysterium, Hero's parents' slave, is the ideal shlemiehish foil to Pseudolus.

In sharp contrast to the frolic of Forum, the intense heat and emotion of West Side Story sears the audience.

The story is well known but brought much closer to audience sensibilities by its modern adaptation. It is an in-your-face depiction of the prejudice, intolerance and violence experienced on the hardscrabble, ghettoized streets of the alienated urban life of the 1960s. The play takes place in New York, but it is not about New York.

Jerome Robbins created the original concept for the story and choreographed its dance. Arthur Laurentis wrote the book, Leonard Bernstein wrote the score, and Stephen Sondheim the lyrics. The sheer theatrical power of that super-talented collaboration was said at the time, in 1957, to have changed the face of Broadway forever.

Apart from four adult characters, youth dominates. The play is about the unsettled state of youth. All the roles are of young people in or at the periphery of street gangs. The terrain they inhabit is bleak: anger, anxiety, torment, tension, low boiling points; hair-trigger emotion and guns are the landscape. Amidst this repressive and oppressive environment, Tony and Maria find one another. Love, they are certain, will transform the desperation of their lives. But in the end, the desperation of their lives merely accentuates the impossibility of their love.

The cast is outstanding. Seamless ensemble teamwork, unending energy and brassy, athletic, audacious, choreography highlight this dance extravaganza. Choreographer Sergio Trujillo deserves commendation for his work. And the music simply soars. Whether solo, in duet or in ensemble, the singing and the acting lift the audience experience into a higher realm of theatre enjoyment.

The entire cast performed wonderfully. However, first-time Stratford performers Chilina Kennedy as Maria and Jennifer Rias as Anita were absolutely outstanding.

Dan Chameroy as Miles Gloriosus and Bruce Dow as Pseudolus in A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum.

Chilina Kennedy as Maria and Paul Nolan in West Side Story.

Cyrano de Bergerac presents a third face of love. Essentially a tale of unrequited love, it deals with notions far less explored today, far less familiar to us in our civilization of machines and high-tech wizardry: honour, duty, ethics, integrity, probity, character.

Ever self-conscious about his appearance, the central swashbuckling, erudite, occasionally pedantic Cyrano believes that the love he bears in his heart must always be a secret.

Written at the end of the 19th century by Edmond de Rostand, the story takes place some 200 years before, based upon a person who had actually existed and tilted at the noble windmills of his heart and conscience.

Rostand very consciously and deliberately focuses attention on the poetry of Cyrano's life – both as metaphor and as fact – on the words of discourse that convey their messages through sound, structure and imagery as well as meaning.

Donna Feore directs the play after the fashion that Rostand had imagined Cyrano lived his life: with flair, panache and an overriding regard for the esthetics in the details of human endeavour. She astutely melds comedy with melancholy, French with English, swordplay with tranquillity, buffoonery with sublimity. As an example, the balcony scene involving Cyrano, Roxanne and Christian is deeply moving.

Rostand has written the role of Cyrano as a profoundly complicated warrior, philosopher and poet. Colm Feore plays the role to the exciting, occasionally pitiable, always emotionally evocative hilt of the character. He displays a verbal and physical virtuosity that commands the stage. We laugh and we cry with Cyrano. And we feel for him and for the love whose embrace, though so close at hand, he was destined to know only at a heartbreaking distance.

Colm Feore as Cyrano de Bergerac. [David Hou photos]

The three plays – Forum, West Side Story and Cyrano – are very different meditations on love. They are very different emotional explorations of the subject. Tears and laughter, sensation and sorrow, hope and despair, possibility and fulfilment are the terra sancta of love and as the Stratford Shakespeare Festival has proved, excellent material for the theatre too.

Difficult stories, difficult lives

By NORMAN RAVVIN

In a long, autobiographical story in Aleksandar Hemon's new collection Love and Obstacles (Riverside Books), the narrator offers a portrait of his father, for whom "a perfect world consisted of objects you could hold in your hand."

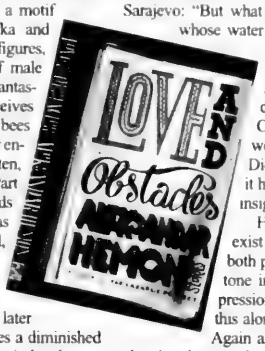
Such a perfect world is meaningful to readers who recognize when a piece of writing is so finely wrought it feels as though it can be held in your hand and looked at from many angles. The novel that best fits this description is F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby. Its scenarios, its voice, the flavour of its melancholic view of 1920s America bears repeated reading.

Norman Ravin

Of the eight stories in Love and Obstacles, one or two rise to this level, while the rest tend to ramble and shift abruptly in tone. Remarkably, most of the collection's contents appeared in The New Yorker, the best short story venue available in English for many decades. There, J.D. Salinger presented his long masterpieces Franny and Zooey; while, since the 1950s, work by John Cheever, John Updike, Saul Bellow, Philip Roth, Mavis Gallant and Alice Munro has presented the novelistic possibilities of the short story.

The two longest pieces in Love and Obstacles that stand a chance against their New Yorker competition are called The Noble Truths of Suffering and The Bees, Part 1. The former is a bitter portrait of contemporary Sarajevo through the eyes of an ex-Sarajevan who has returned from his American writing life for a visit. Even better is The Bees, Part 1, which mines a vein well handled by other central European writers of the postwar period, including Danilo Kis and Bohumil Hrabal. These writers share with Hemon an ironic view of adolescence spent under Soviet regimes, along with an even further backward glance at the lives of ancestors who witnessed the devastation of World War II.

The Bees, Part 1 uses the narrator's father's autobiographical writings to trace the role of beekeeping from before World War I until the collapse of Bosnia into civil war and fratricidal killing. Hemon applies a motif familiar from the work of Kafka and Bruno Schulz, where ancestral figures, especially fathers in the work of male writers, take on mythical, even phantasmagoric shapes. The narrator receives his father's report on living with bees in "a manila envelope with another envelope inside, on which was written, in a dramatic cursive, 'The Bees, Part 1.' I have to confess that my hands trembled as I flipped through it, as if I were unrolling a sacred scroll, uncovered after a thousand years of sleep."



The father's appreciation of his ancestry, and his sense of a world destroyed needlessly, comes sharply into focus in the course of the story. His later years are spent in Hamilton, Ont., where he lives a diminished cliché of an immigrant's life. From his high-rise window he can see "piles of snow, the smokestacks of the Hamilton steel mills, and a vacant parking lot. It was all black and white and bleak and grey, like an existentialist European movie… He started despairing as soon as he set foot on Canadian soil: he didn't know where they had landed, how they were going to live and pay for food and furniture… And it was perfectly clear to him that he would never learn the English language."

The narrator's parents play a role in The Noble Truths of Suffering, but in this story they are farcical rather than tragic figures. Having brought a Pulitzer Prize-winning American author to their home for a Bosnian luncheon feast, the narrator discovers, months later, that his parents appear as recognizable ironic victims in one of the famous American's stories. In The Noble Truths of Suffering, Hemon allows himself a rare expression of love for his once-hometown, Sarajevo: "But what about the Gazi Husrevbegova fountain, whose water tastes like no other in the world? What about all the minarets lighting up simultaneously at sunset on a Ramadan day? And the snow falling slowly, each flake coming down patiently, separately…" Of his American compatriot, the narrator wonders, "What did he think of Sarajevo? Did he like it? Could he see how beautiful it had been before it became this cesspool of insignificant, drizzly suffering?"

Hemon's characters, almost to the last man, exist in this space of resentment over losses both personal and ancestral. The most common tone in Love and Obstacles is a corrosive expression of disdain for almost everything. It is not this alone that makes Hemon a challenging read. Again and again the reader encounters awkward phrasing that may be meant to convey the temper of disjointed lives, but simply reads badly. An apartment is said to look "hollow, devoid of all these crumbles of a lived life that lead you back home." Stairs are said to squeak "with untroddenness." Again and again one wonders why Hemon's editors felt these sorts of oddities were the best way to bring across the difficult lives at the centre of Love and Obstacles.

Norman Ravvin's forthcoming novel from Gaspereau Press is The Joyful Child. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

An inspiring, true tale

A Thread of Grace (Random House, 2005), Mary Doria Russell's third novel, is a riveting book of exceptional literary and narrative power.

Set in the harrowing, difficult days of the autumn of 1943, Russell tells the true story of the rescue of some 40,000 Jews from the frenzied, murderous intentions of the Nazis.

Hitler's forces have seized control of northern Italy. The Jews – of Italy and those from neighbouring countries who had sought sanctuary in Italy – are trapped. But, as Russell tells us in heart-rending, touching fashion, they are not alone.

Unwilling to turn their backs on the hapless remnant of a long-persecuted humanity, on fellow human beings seeking merely to live, the ordinary men and women of northern Italy come to the aid of the fleeing Jews, helping them avoid the roundups, the humiliations and the trains to the death camps.

Russell describes the courage, heroism, generosity and self-sacrifice of the countless men and women who fought against Nazi tyranny to powerful effect. The characterizations are compelling. The research into the details of the events is impeccably solid. The pace of the narrative travels briskly through tension and tenderness. And the story itself, holds the heart captive in a grip of sorrow, excitement and catharsis.

Lest readers think that there is more fiction than fact at play in Russel's work, she concludes the novel with the words of the following inscription chiselled on a marble memorial stele erected in Borgo San Daalmazo in 1998 by the Jews of Satin-Martin-Vesubie in honour of the people of Valle Stura and Valle Gesso.

"When racial hatred raged in Europe,
Jewish refugees, uncertain of their fate, coming from distant countries – Austria, Belgium, Germany, Poland –
Found hospitality and safety in these valleys.
Hidden in isolated cottages,
Protected by the population,
They waited with trust and hope,
Through two interminable winters,
For the return of liberty.
In homage to and in memory of those who helped them,
Those refugees and their descendants
Embrace the noble inhabitants of these valleys in brotherhood."

A Thread of Grace is a moving, inspiring, important story. – MBD

'I think I played well'

She opened the tournament by overcoming Romanian Monica Niculescu 6-4, 4-6, 7-6 in a three-hour match before a "falafel friendly" crowd of partisan supporters chanting, "Kadima, Shahar!" and waving Israeli flags. Pe'er won the baseline battle in the third set tie-breaker with three straight points off her backhand to win 7-4.

Pe'er continued her grit against second round opponent Francesca Schiavone of Italy. Each player traded service breaks, but Pe'er dominated her opponent with persistent forehands, winning the first set tie- break 7-2. Pe'er lost serve twice, but had the resolve to then break her opponent three times in the second set to win 7-6, 6-4.

In her final match before 10,000 fans in the stadium and a national television audience on TSN, Pe'er looked flat and dispirited trailing 6-1 in the opening set against fourth seed Elena Dementieva of Russia, who went on to win the tournament. However, Pe'er rallied in the second set by breaking Dementieva three times, and held serve twice to win the second set 6-1

'Shahar superb at Rogers Cup'

Pe'er trailed again 4-1 in the final set, only to show her resolve once more by breaking Dementieva and holding serve to tie the score 4-4. After Dementieva held serve for a 5-4 lead, Pe'er trailed in her final service game but saved four break points before sailing a forehand long for Dementieva to win the dramatic match 6-1, 1-6, 6-4 in two hours, 45 minutes, avoiding the near upset by Pe'er.

"Shahar is such a fighter. She never gives up, fights for every point and plays till the end. She got a lot of winners and her aggressive tennis always make her tough to play," said Dementieva following the match.

Pe'er's great play and third round finish in the Rogers Cup will improve her ranking. Although she has not yet returned to the form that had her finish as a Rogers Cup quarter-finalist in 2006, Pe'er has regained her fighting spirit to battle any opponent at the Rogers Cup.

"I feel that I played well and can compete at a level that I can play against anyone. I was very happy with my week in Toronto and thank the many fans who supported me in all my matches," she said following her final match.

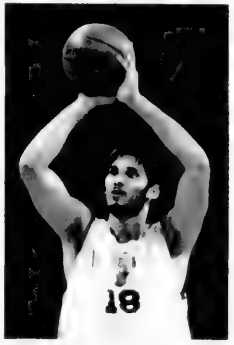
Israeli hoops star Casspi impresses NBA team

By SAM AMICK
and YANIV ORGAD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LAS VEGAS — Omri Casspi is probably the first Israeli to spend an entire week in Las Vegas without visiting a casino once, not even to observe. "It's a city full of temptations, but I'm here on a business trip," explained the Sacramento Kings forward with a smile after playing his fifth NBA summer league contest recently.

"The social part here is a bit different," said Casspi, who poured in 11 points and pulled down nine rebounds in the King's 81-74 win over the New York Knicks. "The coaches tell you when the bus will come to pick you up the following morning, and that's it. From here on, you're responsible for yourself."

Sacramento is sending signs that Casspi is for keeps – the front office has begun discussions about an exhibition game with Maccabi Tel Aviv in October 2010 in Israel. "Casspi is definitely meeting our expectations," stressed Jason Levien, the team's assistant GM. "We picked him because of his potential, high work ethic and the emotions he brings to the game, combined with his aggressiveness and toughness. We got a chunk of all of that this week."



Omri Casspi

What Sacramento perhaps did not appreciate fully is the added value of Casspi being the first Israeli in the NBA and the subsequent profit potential. The high school arena that played host to the summer league was filled with Israelis and Jews from all over Nevada and California to cheer on Casspi. When the games finish, his cellphone rings nonstop with people calling to ask how they can help and to wish him well.

Casspi continues to appreciate all of it, knowing full well that the support can only help. "It's a lot of people," he said. "It's everybody, everybody, and not just in Israel. It's here [in Las Vegas], San Francisco, Los Angeles, everybody is just saying, 'If you need something, call me.'"

The Jewish-Israeli enthusiasm has also pushed sales of his number 18 jersey past those of some of his teammates and helped a surge in season-ticket sales for a team that won just 17 of 82 games last season.

Casspi took several games to find his rhythm. His summer league began a day late when he wasn't granted release from his former team by FIBA, the world governing body for basketball. Casspi missed one day of Kings practice and agonized to get started on the court. His lack of conditioning didn't help his situation either, as Casspi was the first to admit he was out of shape heading into play because he hadn't played five-on-five since the end of Maccabi Tel Aviv's season.

Learning the NBA style of basketball has been quite a challenge as well. But as Casspi knows, there is plenty of time to adjust. "It's so different," he said. "The European game is a team game. You're not going to see guys shooting the ball until there's five or six passes on offence. The athleticism, the quickness of the players here, the individual skill, is different. I'm trying to find the new game and understand it and it makes me a little bit off my rhythm."

Paul Westphal, the Kings' head coach, says it will take time for Casspi to adjust to his team's system and he needs to develop physically.

Funds raised at Israel Tennis Center

Supporters of Israel Tennis Centres (ITC) had a pretty good reason to celebrate recently, as Israel registered a stunning victory over Russia in Davis Cup play.

The men's team advanced to the semifinals for the first time ever, going further than more favoured nations such as Australia, France and the United States.

Harel Levy, Dudi Sela, Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram led the Israelis past the Russians. They will play defending champion Spain in the semis in Torre Pacheco Murcia Stadium, near Cartagena, from Sept. 18 to 20.

Notably, all the Israeli tennis players are ITC alumni. Sela was among the dignitaries present at a reception hosted by the ITC's Canadian fundraising arm. The event was held at the Canada Stadium, funded by Canadians 33 year ago, and attended by donors to Israel Children's Centers (ICC), which supports ITC programs, Maccabi Canada officials and visiting dignitaries. The president of the Toronto branch of the ICC, Kevin Green, will become international chair of the organization next month.

The ICC is housed at the ITC and is a not-for-profit entity that funds the ITC's recreational facilities for marginalized children while developing high-performance athletes.

The ICC serves almost 10,000 youngsters a week at 14 ITC facilities across Israel, from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Be'er Sheva in the south.

The centres run coexistence programs that bring Arab and Jewish kids together, as well as programs for the developmentally disabled and programs that assist in the integration of Ethiopian immigrants.

In Canada, the ICC recently held its 17th annual fundraiser and charity tournament at Angus Glen Golf Club, and in September, it will host an annual event at York Racquets Club to aid children's programs in Israel.

The world's first virtual brain

Compiled by CJN Staff

Baycrest is leading a team of international scientists in a mammoth project to create the world's first functional, virtual brain.

The effort puts Canada in a global race to pull off a neuroscience feat that is comparable to decoding the human genome. The achievement could revolutionize how clinicians assess and treat various brain disorders, including cognitive impairment caused by stroke and Alzheimer's disease.

"We are developing the first electronic atlas of human functional networks in the brain," says Randy McIntosh, project leader and director, senior scientist at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute (RRI), ranked among the top cognitive neuroscience programs in the world.

The RRI has partnered with scientists from the United States, Australia, Spain, France and the Netherlands to construct a virtual brain that will replicate typical patterns of brain activity that occur when people are engaged in a thinking task, such as remembering a phone number, reading a book or problem solving.

As mental processes unfold, the brain can combine the actions of several networks. Mapping complex integrative brain dynamics has been described as writing the ultimate symphony score for the working brain, and it requires experts in sophisticated mathematical modelling techniques.

It is also a huge informatics challenge that requires uploading thousands of brain pattern configurations from lab data into several super computers. (Informatics is an academic field that encompasses artificial intelligence, cognitive science, computer science, information science and social science.)

Once all of the data of a normal, healthy functioning brain from childhood to old age is uploaded to build the foundation of the virtual brain, dynamics will be added to map the interplay between different brain areas during a mental task.

The virtual brain will have the same functional architecture of a real, working brain. It will not only become a powerful tool for researchers but also provide clinicians who are involved in the assessment, maintenance and rehabilitation of brain function in patients with a cutting-edge tool.

Baycrest leading team of international scientists in mammoth project

For example, a 55-year-old patient suffers a stroke and is left with moderate cognitive impairment. The patient's unique neural architecture post-stroke will be uploaded into the virtual brain to see how the synthetic model responds to the disruption of normal network patterns and attempts to re-stabilize. This will assist the clinician in identifying the best options for cognitive interventions that target specific areas in the brain.

The main competition for the Canadian-led project is the Blue Brain Project in Switzerland. Swiss project director Henry Markram predicts his team will unveil their functional brain software within the next 10 years. McIntosh, a professor in the department of psychology at the University of Toronto, says his team has a similar 10-year horizon.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

My parents have been divorced since I was 10 years old. I am now 32 with children of my own. Until very recently, we all managed very nicely. Dad and mom have not been on speaking terms for years, but we have worked out visitation schedules so that they both have lots of time with their grandchildren and they even spend holidays with us on a rotating basis.

Last year, dad met a woman who is much younger than he is. In fact, she is my age. She has no career, has never been married and, as far as I can tell, is nothing but an opportunist. I don't trust her and don't want her near my kids. This year, it is dad's turn to spend Rosh Hashanah with us. I've told him he is welcome, but she is not. He is furious and feels I have no right to dictate who he sees and says I am blackmailing him. What should I do?

Not Around My Kids

Dear Not Around My Kids

There is no question you are in a difficult situation. You don't want to hurt your dad, and yet you have your limits as to what you are prepared to accept.

The real question is why are you so upset? Are you upset because you think your dad looks foolish? Are you afraid she will bilk him of his finances or that she is taking your place in his life? Are you concerned she will be a bad influence on your children?

The bottom line is, you are inviting him to join your family for Rosh Hashanah. He needs to respect your wishes. This is not the time to argue over whether he can bring a date.

If your father is serious about this new lady, you might want to make an effort to get to know her. However, Rosh Hashanah is not the place for this to happen. You have a right to enjoy your holiday with your family without the drama of an unwanted stranger present. This is not blackmail, this is your preference.

Perhaps once you get your emotions in check, you can give him a rational explanation and leave the door open for future possibilities. Your dad will be less apt to get his back up and the two of you can work this out. Hopefully you will both come to some kind of compromise for future events, but for now, enjoy Rosh Hashanah with your family and let's hope your dad joins you as well.

Enjoying more happiness now

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

I am always excited to learn about new ways to help my clients and readers find a way to get closer to their happiest self. In my last column, I talked about being happy for no reason. But I really wanted to teach my readers how to enjoy more happiness right now, with actual tips on training our minds to be happy on a daily basis.

There was a wonderful television documentary on BBC called How To Be Happy. In it, Robert Holden, the author of the book Be Happy: Release the Power of Happiness in You, gives viewers a front-row seat to his eight-week happiness course. The course was tested by independent scientists such as Prof. Richard Davidson of the University of Wisconsin-Madison who wrote, "This happiness training not only changes the way you feel: it actually changes the way your brain functions." In the series, Holden introduces the viewers to proven principles and exercises that have been hailed as a "fast-track to happiness."

One of the key themes in the series and in the book is defining true happiness, which involves giving up the pursuit of happiness out there and following the joy inside of you right here and right now. The really interesting thing about this is that Holden opens with a wonderful chapter in which he invites his readers to do a "happiness interview."

The interview includes the following questions: What is your definition of happiness?; And are you living it?; Who is the happiest person you know?; And what have they taught you about true happiness?; How important is happiness to you?; For instance, is happiness a primary life goal for you?; Do you ever make happiness a conscious intention at the start of your day?; Do you consider happiness to be part of your life's purpose?

What is so fascinating about these interviews is that in creating the happiness project, Holden's mission statement was to "talk happiness." A happiness course was organized, and in it, Holden asked everyone to divide into groups of two. Each person had the opportunity to deliver a "happiness monologue." The other person listens and then asks some questions: "What is the main lesson you learned about yourself and your relationship to happiness by doing the happiness monologue?; What was the most truthful thing you said?; Is there anything else you wish you had said?

You can do this and other "talk happiness" assignments with your family members. This is a great exercise to do with children. Holden believes that when you really listen to yourself and what you think about happiness, understand how you block it from happening and how you can allow yourself to become happier, then you make happiness more possible. What he also noticed from the people he interviewed is that just talking about happiness makes you happy.

If you can't form a larger group, get together with one friend to talk happiness, or even talk into a tape recorder.

You can start with the subject, "My definition of happiness." You could also write a page on what happiness means to you.

A wonderful way to get started is to keep a happiness journal for eight weeks, 15 minutes a day. "You can record all your personal notes, reflections, scribbles, doodles, inquiries and epiphanies. The happiness journal is a gift you give yourself. If you have ever kept your own journal, you know how rewarding this process can be. You can use your journal to record one big gratitude a day," Holden says.

"Your journal literally helps you write and re-write the story of your life in a way that is more meaningful and enjoyable for you. Every day you can write more happiness into your life."

Community Focus

Connecting to the community via diverse routes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Twice in the past 14 months, I've found community when I wasn't consciously looking for it.

The first time was at my synagogue, when I was saying Kaddish for my father. Although I'd always considered my congregation warm, I'd never really thought of it in terms of being a community.

More recently, I reconnected with my elementary school classmates online, in anticipation of a reunion we had last month.

I hadn't seen most of the 33 students from Isabel Telfer's 1964-1966 class at Wilmington Avenue Public School, where the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's south branch is now housed, since our previous reunion in the mid-1980s.

Virtual connections can play a powerful role in creating and enhancing communities

In the weeks before we met in person, our group's e-mails flew back and forth. One day I received more than 100. The ongoing online conversation was filled with shared history, humour and goodwill – a welcome surprise to my inner nine-year-old, a shy bookworm who was unathletic to boot.

Eight elementary school classmates, who reconnected through a series of e-mails before a class reunion, meet again two nights later. From left are Frances Kraft, Cindy Joseph, Ron Savlov, Ronnie Dale, Paul Truster, Sheryl Lipton, Michelle Shanker and Shelly Schlifer Camm.

Around the same time, CJN news editor Jeff Rosen shared some of his notes from the American Jewish Press Association's annual conference, held this year in Chicago in June. One line in particular resonated with me: "Communities used to be defined geographically; now they are defined virtually."

This summer, I learned first-hand that virtual connections can play a powerful role in creating and enhancing communities.

The overall Jewish community, particularly in Toronto, is large and multi-faceted, and we need smaller-scale, more personal links to facilitate a feeling of connection to the community at large.

In this supplement, we look at some of the people who facilitate those links and the contexts in which they occur.

Although I didn't originally plan to write an article about my grades 3, 4 and 5 reunion, I found it so compelling that I reconsidered, and have included it, in the supplement.

We also look at the observant community in Toronto's Cedarvale area; Kulanu Toronto, a Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered and queer social group; the role of the community at times of bereavement; and the meaning of Jewish community in general.

Among other articles are interviews with Alvin Rebick, kitchen manager of the non-profit organization Food Share; Tamara Rebick, immediate past youth director for the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY); and Reena board member Paula Sonshine, who lives by the credo, "Think with your heart" – an apt motto for anyone nurturing community connections to consider.

The Canadian Council for Reform Judaism wishes you a Shana Tova. May 5770 be filled with good health, contentment and shalom.

Reform Judaism provides opportunity for committed Jews to observe tradition while providing the freedom for interpretation. Guided by three main tenets; God, Torah, and Israel, we offer a spiritual and welcoming community

- Meaningful and participatory worship • Exciting opportunities for youth • Educational experiences for every age and stage
- Egalitarian prayer • Engaging music • Strong support for Israel • A commitment to justice for all people

Community means different things to different people

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada and an immigrant herself, Mila Voihanski has given much thought to the meaning of Jewish community.

Mila Voihanski, seen with her young granddaughter, Emma, immigrated to Toronto 35 years ago. The executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services says that for newcomers, sending their children to Jewish schools and celebrating the High Holidays can signify that they are part of the Jewish community.

A native of Ukraine who came to Toronto 35 years ago following a two-year stint in Israel, Voihanski believes that "Jewish community" means different things to different people.

Sociologist Randal Schnoor agrees. "It's hard to define a single Jewish community," he says. "There's a lot of diversity, and competing bodies... It's hard to say who is the one voice for the Jewish community.

"On a more individual level, people connect to different dimensions of the Jewish community. They might feel connected to the Sephardi Jewish community, or the gay Jewish community, so I don't like to define for someone else what is the Jewish community."

"For many people, the Jewish community is Am Yisrael," said Voihanski. "It's the people who represent the community."

For newcomers, she said, sending their children to Jewish schools and celebrating the High Holidays can be aspects of their lives that signify being part of the Jewish community.

Voihanski noted that, for many people, being involved in Jewish community – specifically the "organized" Jewish community – means "participating in events, volunteering, and contributing to the UJA campaign."

But for new immigrants, she explained, "there's no doubt that, at the beginning of the resettlement process, jobs, housing and schools are a priority. That's normal."

At the same time, she added, "those priorities are being realized in a Jewish area with Jewish schools, [and children attending] Jewish camps. For a lot of people, belonging to a Jewish community centre or just feeling you can be near a synagogue [signifies community].

"I find that it's very individual, but at the same time it's something that gives people the feeling of living in the Jewish community... It's going into Sobeys and having the ability to buy kosher food. Those things to a lot of people represent the Jewish community."

Other aspects of community life such as synagogue membership, contributing to UJA or serving on a board – come later, she said.

If immigrants feel their heritage is respected, they are more likely to become involved, she pointed out.

As well, she said, it's difficult to penetrate into an established community. "That's why you see a lot of newcomer groups keeping to themselves."

David Koschitzky

Voihanski, who began her career at JIAS 34 years ago as an interpreter, and her husband, whom she met in Toronto, joined Beth Tikvah Synagogue some 30 years ago after they were invited to Shabbat dinner a couple of times at the home of a congregant who knew Voihanski's husband through his work.

After that, the couple tried attending a Shabbat service. "I didn't know if I'd feel comfortable," recalls Voihanski. "They took us by our hands and introduced us to some people."

As it turned out, the experience was positive. The Voihanskis liked both the service and the people. Voihanski said that, having grown up in Russia at a time when "being Jewish was something we had to hide," she appreciates the togetherness and the spirit of the Jewish community here.

"I think it's something we all have to remember. I really hope the younger generation understands that, too. We need to do as much as we can to involve the younger generation."

David Koschitzky, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, says that Jewish community in Canada in modern times is "a little bit more complicated that it used to be in Europe.

"Until the 1600s or 1700s, community was defined for us by the authorities. Everybody had to register as a Jew."

In contrast, he sees today's community as "a voluntary club.

"The current Jewish community is defined by those who want to belong, and membership is based upon sharing similar Jewish values," Koschitzky said.

He compares federation to a "switchboard that tries to connect people to areas where they have needs," such as Jewish education, or services offered by Jewish Family & Child, JIAS or JVS.

Although the federation has initiatives to reach out to newcomers, Israeli and Russian Jews in particular, Koschitzky said that "those who are [already] here feel comfortable. We need to work on ourselves to be more open."

At the same time, he added, "we would hope newcomers would also feel a need to reach out to us.

A native of Calgary who has also lived in Chicago and knows what it's like to be a newcomer in a community, Koschitzky said "it takes two.

"Whenever you're a newcomer to any community, there are challenges that you face... that's part of life."

> They took us by our hands and introduced us to some people

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child, says that "community is what brings people together."

Sometimes known informally as Toronto's community chaplain, Rabbi Weiss – who has served in his current role in hospitals, care facilities and jails since 1994 – believes that "Judaism is the common denominator... We all have a Jewish identity. I try to strengthen that identity and, in so doing, give people strength to deal with whatever they are encountering."

Tamara Rebick sees USY as 'phenomenal' model

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As someone who has been involved with United Synagogue Youth (USY) for 20 years, Tamara Rebick says it's important that parents encourage their kids to become involved in the community at a young age.

"It's great for a resume, it's great for getting a job, it's great for making friends, and it's great for feeling Jewish," said the 33-year-old Rebick, who has recently stepped down from her post as regional youth director and youth chair for the Eastern Canadian Region of USY (ECRUSY).

"USY is this phenomenal model where you can connect and be active in your Judaism through social action, if that type of thing is of interest to you. If you have an interest in all things Zionism and Israel, you can connect that way. If religion is something you're curious about and spirituality, you can connect that way," she said, adding that USY also offers many travel opportunities to Israel, Europe and across North America.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and comprises 17 regions with more than 400 local chapters. Along with Kadima, a pre-teen program for kids in grade 6 to 8, USY includes 25,000 members throughout North America.

ECRUSY has about 450 members representing eight synagogues in six cities in Montreal, London, Ont., Ottawa, Toronto, St. Catharines, Ont., and Hamilton, Ont.

Rebick, who is the director of student activities in the Jewish studies program at the south campus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, joined ECRUSY in 1989.

She said her involvement in the youth group helped her find the social and cultural relevance in her Jewish education.

"My parents invested in my Jewish education and sent me to [United Synagogue Day School], and it was really in USY that I started doing the things that I had learned about in class," she said.

"What was cool to me was that we would go on a USY convention and we – we being the kids – were completely capable of running an entire service by ourselves. For me, I only had associated all these things I had learned in class with shul, which isn't very exciting or engaging. But all of a sudden, I would go to the convention and all these kids were reading Torah and the kids were running the service, and we knew all the tunes and there was something fun and cool about the fact that we could do this on our own. For me that was really inspirational."

Tamara Rebick recently left her position at ECRUSY to spend more time with her young family, but will continue to be available to the organization as a resource.

She said that ECRUSY was a great way to connect with the young members of her shul, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, as well as an opportunity to meet kids from other congregations.

"It was a chance for us to see that there were a lot of kids like us out there."

Students have leadership opportunities at all levels

Rebick said that over the years, she moved up the ranks.

"Every level offers you leadership opportunities. It is an organization that is based on peer leadership and peer education. There is a chapter executive, a regional executive, an international executive, and I had the privilege of sitting on all of them," she said.

"Going through the ranks as a kid, I really got a chance to know the organization from inside out from a lot of perspectives… I felt so indebted to the organization for the confidence it gave me and the skills that it gave me and the doors that it opened for me that I just wanted to share that with everyone."

As a staff member, Rebick said she was able to connect to USY members because she always made sure to engage with them as a friend and a mentor, rather than as an authority figure.

"I shared important, legitimate and sometimes sensitive information with them. I didn't keep them in the dark and make stuff up, and I think that helped build trustworthy relationships with them," she said.

"I work at CHAT now, and the adolescent high school crowd seems to be the age group that I particularly am fond of, because, I think for me, when I was a teenager, that was a really pivotal point in my life, and I think part of me just doesn't ever want to leave that world.

"It definitely keeps you young. My husband accuses me of talking like a 17-year-old on a regular basis," she added with a laugh.Rebick said that when it came to her staff, she wanted to ensure that the people she worked with were just as passionate about creating effective programming as she was.

"One of my favourite things about the USY conventions is that all the staff are my former USYers, for the most part. Nothing could speak volumes more than that."

She said that USY is one of many Jewish organizations that has been coping with a decline in membership.

"I think that in general the role of youth movements are in a difficult spot right now… Affiliation has become something that is not on the radar of a lot of kids. It is much easier to be Jewish now, for the most part. Not just in Toronto… Before we used to get tons and tons of kids, because this was their Jewish connection," she said.

Most staff are former USYers

"Parents would not balk at the price of a convention. They would stick their kids on a bus and say, 'Go meet a Jewish boy, go have your fun.' But even so, there are different ways to connect Jewishly and just the concept of affiliating, and paying membership dues and being part of a formal organization, it just doesn't seem to be as important now as it was before."

Rebick said that the USY model hasn't changed much in 50 years, because the approach was "ahead of its time back then. It is still relevant. It is a model that works. It is a model that produces incredibly strong leaders. It is a model that provides kids with a very enriching experience beyond a Saturday night of something to do socially."

She added that when USYers plan a Saturday night program, "it's not just, 'Show up, pay your five bucks, have a good time and eat some chips.' There are a group of kids who planned it and they've learned about marketing and they've learned about outreach and they've learned about planning and cold calling and membership engagement, they've learned about logistics coordination and everything involved in planning a program."

Rebick, who decided to step away from USY to spend more time with her young family, said she will continue to be available to the organization as a resource.

"I'm almost certain that this isn't the end for me."

Shabbos in Cedarvale: an 'un-Orthodox' enclave

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

It's a different kind of Orthodox community. On the westernmost fringe of Forest Hill, in the nook known as Cedarvale, is an eclectic, thriving outpost of energetic, committed Jews.

Many feel they've come home at last. "Cedarvale reminds me of England, where I was born," says Carole Goldberg, who's lived in the area off and on since the 1980s. "Stores on the street, no big warehouses, no need to drive for fruits and veggies."

Looking for a synagogue within walking distance, Goldberg and her husband were drawn to the Village Shul for its many classes and learning opportunities.

Modya Silver

Even as she's become more religious, Goldberg still cherishes the area's diversity. "We have observant and non-observant people in our community," she says. "Everyone learning from everyone else."

"It's very open and accepting," agrees Michael Conforti. In the more typically religious area where he lived before, Conforti "felt a lot of pressure, in terms of people looking at you, maybe having to behave in a way that wasn't necessarily true to myself.

"I wasn't yet wearing a kippah full time. That was something that I struggled with for the first year that I lived down here. I could openly discuss it, and people knew I was dealing with that on a personal level. It definitely felt easier to deal with that here."

Longtime resident Modya Silver says, "I have nothing negative to say about communities where every house is frum, [but] I like to expose my kids, and myself, to diversity."

Minutes from the subway, a charming older neighbourhood of bungalows and two-storey homes once thought to be past its Jewish prime, Cedarvale is also marvellously "central to everything in the city," says Silver.

But making Jewish life work in this area takes balance, and a growing core of observant families and individuals is seeding the community's growth.

"You need those people to make Shabbat and chagim pleasurable," says Conforti. "Without that, you're basically sitting alone."

If there's a downside to life outside the Jewish mainstream, it's a lack of kosher food. Eglinton Avenue West offers three high-end restaurants and Baskin-Robbins. There's also a local treat: Dutch Dreams on Vaughan Road, at St. Clair Avenue, well worth the bike ride for ice cream on a sunny day. Sobey's on Marlee Avenue and Loblaws on St. Clair Avenue, at Bathurst, both offer a selection of kosher meat and dairy, but not much more.

"It'll be nice if that evolves," says Conforti. "It's a much easier life, frankly, in Thornhill. Everything's contained in four or five city blocks. Here, you have to go a bit farther."

And although Conforti's son, Shalev, is not even a year old, Conforti and his wife are also aware of the area's lack of Orthodox schools. The couple is leaning toward Netivot HaTorah in Thornhill, a long commute for a small child.

Narayever and Village Shul people, and everybody in between

There's also the problem of finding friends. "On Shabbat, who are they going to play with?"

"That said, the community is definitely growing," he adds. At least in summer, there's no danger of kids spending Shabbat alone. Weekly Shabbat gatherings in Cedarvale Park let kids nosh and run around, while adults toss a Frisbee – or talk Torah.

I try to put myself in the 'growing' camp

"You've got [First] Narayever [Congregation] people in shorts and tank tops, Village Shul people coming after a huge lunch and shluff, and everybody in between," says Sarah Borer, a stay-at-home mom. "They don't just tolerate each other – they become friends. I haven't seen that in other areas."

A "serious Jew" who is not Orthodox, Borer feels more than welcomed; she and her husband, Terry, love the Shabbat gatherings for their "intellectually honest discussions about religion."

Many here resist the term Orthodox. "I don't like labels," says Silver, founder of the mussar (ethics and morality in Judaism) website Madrega.com. He quotes the Village Shul's Rabbi Ahron Hoch: "'There are two kinds of Jews – growing and not growing.' I try to put myself in the 'growing' camp."

That also means actively seeking others on a similar path. Along with two other local families, Silver and his wife, Orit Freedman, host Carlebach-style Friday-night davening and potlucks for the entire community.

"In some communities," Borer, who runs a Hebrew playgroup once a week, says, "everything has to happen through the shul – people wait for rabbis to create Jewish opportunities. Here, Judaism is in the home. We don't just see people at shul.

"You can't be lazy here – if you want it to happen, Jewishly, you have to do it yourself."

Goldberg sums up the area's unique blend: "We are on the doorstep of beautiful Forest Hill, making Shabbos afternoon walks quiet and green." And then there are the people "looking for community and driven by spiritual growth and openness." Which means there's always someone new and interesting coming for Shabbat in Cedarvale.

Lone T.O. Jewish LGBT group offers sense of place

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

An ancient Chinese proverb about community states: "One generation plants the trees; another gets the shade."

If that's so, then the founders and current executive of Kulanu Toronto – the city's only non-profit, Jewish lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgendered and queer (LGBTQ) social group – have been sowing the seeds of shelter for its members since 2003, when it was set up by students and Hillel staff at the University of Toronto.

But in the last six years, the organization has become something more than just a student-centric, on-campus LGBT venue.

The group fills a critical void in the Jewish community for self-identified Jews of homosexual and other sexual preference, regardless of age, and offers them a space where they can gather to feel accepted without judgment, according to Kulanu executive director, Justine Apple.

"It's a safe haven where people can go [to come out] and for people who have been out for years."
"A lot of people want to find a social network... and fellow LGBT Jews"

Apple, 33, spoke with The CJN last month about how her organization has helped bring a sense of community to individuals who are often forlorn and confused about their sense of place, feelings she experienced when she came out as a lesbian to friends and family 12 years ago.

"It's a safe haven where people can go [to come out] and for people who have been out for years," she said. "A lot of people want to find a social network... and fellow LGBT Jews."

Had an organization like Kulanu been around when she first came out, Apple said she might have been spared agonizing years of trying to cope with fears of being shunned by her peers and family.

"I ended up seeing counsellors and, thankfully, met another girl," she said, adding that as head of Kulanu now, her goal is to "foster a sense of community for people just coming out, because they're scared."

Though she has dated different people since then, Apple said she has always looked to having a partner who can share in her Jewish identity, because it is an inherent part of her.

According to Apple, Kulanu's members currently number around 350 people, though she expects there are many more potential members in the community, and some may have a harder time "coming out" than others.

"Our members of Orthodox and Conservative backgrounds often find it difficult to find a spiritual community to accept them," she said. "We have members tell us they want to attend shuls where they will be accepted."

Which is why her group tries to facilitate Jewish communal experiences for all members, to keep them connected to the faith.

Some of these include organizing weekly Shabbat dinners and pointing members to LGBT-friendly congregations such as the First Narayever, Darchei Noam and Shir Libeynu.

Perhaps most importantly, Kulanu offers a rallying point for gay Jewish community members to simply be themselves, in a nurturing environment.

"People make strong friend connections through us. Which is as important as finding a life partner. We're a great way to increase a person's self-esteem," Apple said, adding that there are testimonials in which members say that Kulanu has made a positive impact on their lives.

Kulanu executive director, Justine Apple

Mordecai Drache, an aspiring writer and former member on Kulanu's executive, wrote: "If there is one group doing an admirable job at being inclusive of men, women, gays, bisexuals, lesbians, trans-people, Sephardim, Mizrahim and Ashkenazim of varying age groups – some of whom are frum, others of whom are secular; some of whom want a social group and others something more religious – the group that most closely manages to do that is Kulanu Toronto. A community is only as strong as the individuals within it, and you are part of this community [with Kulanu]."

Another member, who prefers only to be known as "Cathy," had this to say about the group: "Kulanu Toronto has given me the strength and knowledge that I'm not alone as a trans Jew in Toronto. I now have Jewish and non-Jewish friends who are LGBT. The Jewish holidays have special meaning because of all the positive support from people I've met through Kulanu Toronto. The issues in the Jewish community are unique to us. Now I have [someone] whom to contact or just talk to for support."

Acceptance without 'judgment'

Kulanu member Jessica Mirny called Kulanu "an especially important group" because of its uniqueness.

The organization, she wrote, "provides me with the opportunity to further my Jewish cultural learning in an environment that respects me for who I am – as someone who will one day be in a same-sex relationship... someone who will be married with children. Groups like Kulanu Toronto remind me that I do not need to disengage from one part of my identity in order to accept another."

Therein lies the group's true value, Apple said. And one of her main objectives is to increase Kulanu's exposure – the group received a lot of notoriety earlier this summer for its participation in the Toronto Pride festival as the counterbalance to the pro-Palestinian group Queers Against Israel Apartheid – so more people can become aware of its services.

"We've become more visible this year, which is a goal we've set. We'd love for spiritual leaders and synagogues... to help more of our members feel accepted," Apple said.

She also disclosed that the group was considering breaking from strictly being a campus-based organization, and that late last month, Kulanu's executive met with Canadian Jewish Congress to speak about its future.

Apple said the discussion resulted in Kulanu accepting "observer status" at Congress' next community relations committee meeting, scheduled for September.

> 'We've become more visible this year, which is a goal we have set'

Acknowledging a split in the executive ranks about joining with a more politically active, prominent organization, Apple said she thought the potential benefits of partnering with an established organization like Congress could outweigh the costs.

"There's so much potential for Kulanu," she said. "To run more fabulous programs. I'd also love for us to do annual tours to Israel, bring in prominent speakers, attract more members, have a bigger executive and create different committees. We'd also benefit from more fundraising."

She said many people still consider Kulanu a "students only" body, something that branching away from Hillel and the university could change and that aligning with Congress would solidify.

Still, Apple and the Kulanu executive acknowledge the support they continue to receive from Hillel – primarily in the form of free office space provided by the campus organization – and wish to continue to provide a place for students in need of their services.

Yeshiva offers 'support system' for hearing-impaired boys

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

As important as it is to be able to hear, being able to listen to one another's needs is an even more valuable skill.

Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid, in the Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street area, opened in 2001 and is described on its website as "a valuable support system for deaf and hard-of-hearing boys throughout the global Jewish community who struggle academically or socially, in either yeshivos or public schools."

The students at the yeshiva are teens, mostly from the chassidic community.

Warren Miller has developed an appreciation for the chassidic lifestyle teaching at Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid.

Warren Miller, who is deaf, has been teaching math to grade 9 and 11 students at the yeshiva for a year. Miller contracted meningitis when he was a year old and lost his hearing as a result, although he has regained some hearing ability with the use of a hearing aid and a cochlear implant. Despite this, Miller cannot make out whole words clearly. In order to communicate effectively, he reads lips most of the time and uses American Sign Language when conversing with other hearing-impaired individuals, as he does in his classes at the yeshiva.

Miller, 55, is originally from Montreal and took business administration at Concordia University before moving to Toronto 23 years ago. He taught business, computer science and math for one year at George Brown College in the late 1980s, and now divides his time between working as a marketing analyst full time at RBC Royal Bank and teaching at the yeshiva twice a week in the late afternoon.

When Miller attended high school and college, the educational system wasn't as supportive of the needs of people with certain challenges, including hearing impairment. As a result, school was difficult for him.

"I had to do everything myself – it was hard," he says. "I had to hire someone to take notes for me… It's not easy."

Miller believes Nefesh Dovid is the only yeshiva in the world that caters to the hearing-impaired, and Jewish teens who attend the school come from many countries, including the United States, England, Australia, France and Israel.

He says it's difficult for many of them to be away for such long periods of time, but they do get the opportunity to see their families, especially during the High Holidays and Jewish festivals.

"Some of them get homesick, but they go home for the holidays," he says.

The rosh yeshiva, Baltimore native Rabbi Chaim Tzvi Kakon, is also deaf, as are his wife and two of his eight children. All of the students use ASL as their primary means of communication.

In order to accommodate his students as much as possible, Miller tries putting what he teaches into a practical context, in hopes that they will come to appreciate the finer points of the subject.

"I try to give them a lot of examples, try to open up to them about why math is so important," he says.

When asked about how he fits in to the yeshiva's scheme of life, Miller says that although he is a Conservative Jew in a close-knit chassidic community, he has managed to develop an appreciation for their lifestyle.

"I understand their perspectives and beliefs," he says. "Growing up, I never understood what the Torah meant to me, but their [community] understands the Torah… I understand why they believe what they do, and I appreciate what they do with their lives."

Although Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid is doing its part to make education more accessible for those who need it, Miller believes that society could be doing more to accommodate the needs of the deaf and hearing-impaired.

"People need to understand that the hearing-impaired have the same abilities as everyone else and can do the same things as everyone else," he says.

Miller also hopes that Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid is only the first of many such yeshivot that will be established and that the school will continue to grow over time.

Volunteer urges others to think with their hearts

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"Think with your heart" is Paula Sonshine's motto For the past five years, the Toronto mother of four adult children, who teaches special education and English as a second language privately, has been involved with Reena, which serves people with developmental disabilities.

After her first year on the organization's learning and development committee, Sonshine was so impressed by the dedication of fellow committee members, as well as other Reena staff and volunteers, that she decided to host a group of them at her home for lunch. It has since become an annual event known as "Sonshine Day."

The learning and development committee works in an advisory capacity for Reena as well as for the developmental disability counsellor (DDC) training and placement program, a partnership between George Brown College, Reena, and four other agencies.

This September, Sonshine will host her fourth annual Sonshine Day. Each of the outdoor luncheons, at her initiative, has also honoured Reena founder Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who died June 30.

At Sonshine Day, where she has welcomed about 30 guests every year, people started talking to each other in a different context and related as friends, Sonshine told The CJN. The idea was "just to have lunch."

She said it was also an example of what she means when she talks about "thinking with your heart."

Anyone can think with his or her heart, Sonshine said. Reflecting on what motivates her, she said that seeing that she has made a difference in someone's life brings her "so much pleasure."

In June, at the most recent DDC program graduation, Sonshine urged graduates to think with their own hearts and provided gifts of red rubber bracelets inscribed with that message.

Sonshine is "incredibly hospitable… a dynamic person. She's so empathetic and understanding of people, and loves to work with them as a volunteer," says Sandy Keshen, Reena's executive director.

Paula Sonshine displays a plate, decorated by a Reena client, that was presented to her at Sonshine Day in 2007.

Keshen added that Sonshine Day is not a typical event. "It's not a fundraiser. She just opens her home to make linkages between people."

At Reena's annual meeting next month, Sonshine will receive the organization's Board Member of Distinction award for leadership and the devotion of her time to the organization. She has been on Reena's board since last September.

Sonshine, who said she loves to have people over to her house and also to decorate tables, has tried her hand at numerous creative endeavours, including floral design, quilting and cake decorating.

Her appreciation for creativity is evident in the pin she is wearing for an interview - a large enameled cow with moving parts.

Making a difference is someone's life bring 'so much pleasure'

When she taught in the public school system – before her children were born, and again when they were older – Sonshine, who worked for most of her career with special education and ESL students from underprivileged areas, used art as a teaching tool.

She also wrote a teachers' guide sharing those methods.

As a teacher, she focused on students' strengths rather than their weaknesses, she said.

Recently, Sonshine was invited to take part in Itanu Toronto, an initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to include people with special needs in educational, spiritual, communal, social and recreational activities.

Chabad Lubavitch of London 'feeds the people'

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

It's been said that the way to a person's heart is through the stomach, and that statement is no truer than in the Jewish world. The way Rabbi Mordechai Silberberg sees it, the best way to make that kind of connection is at the Shabbat meal.

That's been his creed since starting Chabad Lubavitch of London's Shabbat dinner program, which attracts dozens of students from the University of Western Ontario each week.

A native of Brooklyn, Rabbi Silberberg was asked by Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum of Chabad Ontario to become the full-time representative of Chabad of London, prompting him to move to the city with his wife in 1999.

As director of Chabad Lubavitch of London, one of Rabbi Silberberg's duties is to organize Jewish-themed campus programs.

Originally, Chabad at Western was housed in a relatively small building, but over the years the number of activities grew as more students became involved and so Chabad moved into larger premises.

The 9,000-square-foot building now owned by Chabad is just outside the university's gates and was formerly a Greek Orthodox church.

At first, Rabbi Silberberg wondered if the large space was really necessary, but the decision to move to the new building turned out to be a wise one, he says, as Chabad began attracting many more students.

Of all the programs Chabad of London has undertaken over the years, what stand out the most are the Shabbat dinners, which Rabbi Silberberg describes as "legendary."

"It's a very, very nice mix," he says of his guests. "We have kids who come only for the social [aspect], some kids who come for the spiritual buzz, and we stay till the wee hours of the night farbrenging. It's a beautiful sight sometimes... we have a table of 25 to 30 students singing, and it's a real ruach... a real togetherness. You feel like you're at home."

Rabbi Silberberg says that students come to Chabad's Shabbat dinners through word-of-mouth, which is why he is reluctant to advertise the dinners.

"If you put up posters all over the campus about something, you'll maybe get one student to come from that," he says. "Printing things is a waste of time and a waste of money. It doesn't do anything."

Nechama and Rabbi Mordechai Silberberg.
[CJN file Photo]

The cooking and preparations for the Shabbat dinners are done primarily by Rebbetzin Nechama Silberberg, but participation by dinner guests is a crucial part of the magic, so they are encouraged to help out with preparing the meals and setting the table.

"We create a whole program out of it," Rabbi Silberberg says. "They're not there just to help. They're there to be part of it and prepare the Shabbat meal, and it brings them closer together. Sometimes, we'll have 10 or 15 girls together, sitting and cooking. It's a beautiful thing... it's a tremendous learning experience for a lot of students."

As a self-described "lamplighter" – a term he applies to Chassidim – Rabbi Silberberg believes in the importance of spiritual guidance that is non-judgmental, allowing the individual to grow at his or her own personal rate.

"Growth works at a very slow but steady [pace], and when it comes to Judaism, it's no less. Judaism is not a race," he says. "It's a journey. Of course, we always have to have in mind what our goals are if we want to reach a certain place, but the journey itself in a sense is the ultimate."

He continues: "There are a lot of students from non-observant families who become religious, and there's a lot of guidance that's needed... if you're in a rush to do this, then you have the whole thing wrong."

Every year, Rabbi Silberberg spends the summer in Toronto to reconnect with many of Western's alumni who've moved on, gotten married and begun to raise families.

He admits to feeling a special naches when he hears how much the Chabad programs have enriched their lives and contributed to further Jewish growth, and he hopes that they are passing their knowledge of Judaism down to their children.

"You have to put a lot of time into having those one-on-ones with people, and once you have them move out of campus, they move on and you... continue that," he says. "We want to be there for people.

"If you feed the people, they're not going to go someplace else... the only reason they'll go somewhere else is if you leave them hungry."

My big, fat technology-enhanced grade school reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

My kids, both students in their 20s, thought it was a bit strange – given my age – that I chose to open a Facebook account this past June.

By coincidence, I had received two simultaneous invitations to join the online social networking group.

One was from someone I'd recently finished saying Kaddish with. The other was from a university friend with whom I'd been in touch sporadically. I welcomed the opportunity to stay connected with both of them in a new way.

As well, I knew that there was a Facebook group for my upcoming high school reunion next year, when William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute marks its 50th anniversary.

What I didn't know when I joined Facebook was that my former elementary school classmate, Shelley Schlifer Camm, had already begun to organize a reunion of our Grade 3, 4 and 5 class at Wilmington Avenue Public School, now the south branch of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She had created a Facebook page for the upcoming event, and perhaps half a dozen of the 33 alumni of our class were on it when I joined. Shortly afterward, I learned of the reunion through a chance meeting with a former classmate.

Many of us were together from grades 1 through 6, and even through high school, but grades 3, 4 and 5 were pivotal years for us, both academically and socially. We were in an acceleration class, studying the curriculum for three grades in just two years, from 1964 to 1966, with the same teacher – Isabel Telfer – for both years.

By the time we met on July 12 for our reunion at Shelley's farm about two hours northwest of Toronto, the original list of half a dozen alumni had grown to about 20 attendees, plus an additional four who were in the same Grade 6 class with many of us.

Someone even tracked down our Grade 6 teacher, whom we were all eager to see. She had planned to attend with her husband, who also taught at the school, but in the end, they were unable to be there.

We had had only one previous reunion, also organized by Shelley, in 1985. Many of us hadn't seen each other since that first get-together, when we were joined by Mrs. Telfer. Our former teacher, who was then in her 70s, has since passed away.

For our reunion this summer, the Internet played a key role not only in helping us find each other, but in creating a sense of connection that I'm convinced would have been impossible otherwise.

Shelley's original reunion page saw less and less action as we switched to e-mails, which were more inclusive of those who hadn't joined Facebook.

Gradually, over a period of a few weeks, informational messages – updates on who had been found and who was attending, directions to the farm, and who was bringing what for a pot-luck meal – gave way to a large, exuberant group conversation.

I couldn't wait to open my inbox. Regardless of how recently I'd checked it, there was always a spate of new e-mails waiting for me.

"I've been coming to work at 7:30 a.m., just to be able to read through all the e-mails!" confessed one former classmate, who requested anonymity in print.

We shared memories about our teachers, our experiences, and each other, piecing together our childhood in the process.

Although there were some less-than-fond recollections of 1960s-style discipline, Michael Rotenberg, now an Emmy-winning motion picture and television producer and personal manager in Los Angeles, wrote to us that he thought Mrs. Telfer "was a great teacher who cared about imparting education and good habits to her students."

Ron Savlov, an accountant, remembers being sent to the corner "for brazenly walking up to the front and sharpening a pencil during a social studies class.

"[Mrs. Telfer's] mouth fell open and she merely pointed to the corner," he wrote.

Michael, who couldn't attend the reunion because of a family commitment, wrote that he "loved reading everybody's retrospective thoughts, and through them I have learned a lot about myself."

One woman apologized to another for having been mean to her at camp. Her words warmed my heart, although they weren't directed at me.

I learned at the reunion that I wasn't the only one who'd been hesitant about the possibility of seeing fellow alumni who'd been mean to them as kids.

But from what I saw in the e-mails, my classmates had become adults whom I was interested in spending time with, possessed of insight, warmth, humour and goodwill.

To accommodate one attendee who had become Orthodox, the reunion was rescheduled from Saturday to Sunday. Another classmate provided a separate barbecue and strictly kosher food.

Our childhood in 1960s Bathurst Manor, where only three of the 33 children in Mrs. Telfer's class were not Jewish, gave us a common bond, although we discovered through our e-mails that we were a more diverse group, Jewishly, than some of us had been aware of previously.

Our classmate Tom Rebane, now a cardiologist, regretted that he wasn't able to attend the reunion, but wrote in an e-mail, "Forget the history that bonds us, the spirit of character and warmth of personality displayed in your correspondence is reason enough to want to enjoy your company."

Frances Kraft, flanked by former classmates Ron Savlov and Harriet Heller, holds the valentines they gave her more than 40 years ago.

He wrote that as a non-Jew, he didn't feel like a minority "at all… except during Jewish holidays, when I felt very jealous of everyone else getting days off school."

One thread of e-mail conversation touched on the appropriateness of our having recited the Lord's Prayer every morning.

As a child, I didn't know that it was a Christian prayer. I thought it was just a school prayer.

'What else will I learn at this reunion? Can't wait'

And, like some of my classmates, I didn't realize until I was older that Jews were a minority in Canada.

Another topic of conversation was our participation in a song festival held at the Peoples Church in June 1965, when my class – or to be more precise, those of us who could carry a tune – sang a song called The Pigeons in the Market Square.

"You mean I wasn't the only one who was told to mouth the words?" one woman wrote in an e-mail June 28. "What else will I learn at this reunion? Can't wait."

Isabel Telfer's students pose for a class picture in April 1966, and again in July 2009. Frances Tozman Kraft is in the third row from the bottom, beside her teacher, above, and in the middle row, second from right, at left.

Karen Shenfeld, a Toronto poet who recalls much detail from the Mrs. Telfer years, reminded us in an e-mail that, "when we sing, the 'r's are soft 'r's, not hard. Example – feathers are not feathers, they are 'feathus.' "

It's unanimous: classmates want another reunion

She also advised us, as the reunion approached, that "wh-en we greet each other, we mustn't forget to blow on all those 'w-h' words... wh-at wh-en wh-ere... wh-ich must be pronounced distinctly from 'w' words like 'we' and 'were.'"

As it turned out, we greeted each other with hugs, for the most part.

My childhood friend Lynn Grader Mercer – an e-mail administrator for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency who lives just outside Raleigh, N.C. – ran outside to meet me with a black-and-white snapshot from her seventh birthday party.

I, too, had memorabilia to share. The night before the reunion, I finally found my elementary school scrapbook, with all the valentines I had received from my classmates, as well as the Festival of Song program.

And despite the more than 600 e-mails that we had shared before the reunion, we didn't run out of things to talk about when we met in person.

We posed for pictures, recreating our original class photos as best we could, and we sang The Pigeons, recording it for posterity on video.

Two nights after the reunion, a couple of us were going to get together for dinner with former classmate Michelle Shanker, a reunion absentee, to tell her what she had missed.

Instead, we ended up with a party of eight. Others had also expressed interest in being there, but were unable to join us. I think we didn't want the reunion to end.

It took about a week until the flood of e-mails slowed to a trickle.

Mrs. Telfer's class sang The Pigeons one more time, 44 years later.

Two days after our get-together, I was temporarily blocked from sending any more e-mails as part of Sympatico's anti-spam program.

I contacted a Bell Internet service representative immediately. "I just had a class reunion," I keyed in. "The group e-mails are flying. They are not spam."

Karen credited Jack Newton – now the Calgary-based publisher of Where Canadian Rockies and the alumnus who travelled farthest to the reunion – for having generated much of the excitement.

> 'Our values, established in our early years, are solid... We can all be ourselves'

Once he was contacted, Jack e-mailed to let everyone know he was booking flights. "Quick, someone please e-mail me the times for the reunion," he requested in late June.

In a post-reunion e-mail, Ronnie Dale, now an accountant, shared his thoughts on the connection we all shared.

"We grew up in a predominately middle-class neighbourhood," he wrote. "We were (and still are) nice people. Our values, established in our early years, are solid... We can all be ourselves. We laugh at the same things, and we cry at the same things. We were a family... It was fun to share, and hear the stories we are all familiar with."

Shelley, in addition to hosting the reunion and initiating the idea in the first place, followed up with a survey.

Only one question – "Do you think you would attend another reunion?" – garnered a unanimous response. A resounding "yes."

While 19 per cent thought we should wait a decade, nearly 80 per cent of us would like to get together again within the next five years.

Karen had already summed up the first reunion in an e-mail.

"Thanks again to Shelley for hosting us," she wrote when she returned home that evening. "It was magical."

Poland's first female rabbi is a role model

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

KRAKOW, Poland – Tanya Segal, Poland's first female rabbi, takes her historic achievement in stride.

"Being a woman rabbi is just so natural," said Rabbi Segal, a member of the nascent Reform movement in Poland. "It's a sign of a warm, egalitarian and open Judaism."

A former actress who arrived in Poland several years ago via the Soviet Union and Israel, where she lived for more than a decade, she's not one to dwell on gender issues.

Nonetheless, Rabbi Burt Schuman, her former boss, has described her as "a role model for a whole new generation of Polish Jewish women."

Until quite recently, Rabbi Segal, a youthful 51-year-old single mother with a shock of flowing red hair, was employed by Beit Warszawa, a Warsaw-based liberal Jewish congregation formed in 1999 at the initiative of Seweryn Ashkenazy, a Polish-born Los Angeles real estate developer.

Beit Warszawa, the flagship of the Union of Progressive Jewish Communities in Poland, seeks to rebuild liberal Judaism in this country, where a Jewish revival has been under way since the fall of Communism in 1989.

Rabbi Schuman, an American who left a congregation in Pennsylvania to work in Poland, argues that progressive Judaism is anything but an alien implant in Poland. It's often simplistically assumed that Poland, before the Holocaust, was a land of shtetls inhabited by haredim. And while Orthodoxy was indeed strong in Poland, the Jewish community was actually quite diverse, like Poland itself in those days.

"We were very much part of the tapestry and mosaic of prewar Poland," said Rabbi Schuman, whose grandparents came from Galicia, in what is now southern Poland and Ukraine.

When Rabbi Schuman arrived at Beit Warszawa some years ago, it was still in something of a state of flux, having grown from a handful of foreigners meeting in their homes once a month to a community of congregants meeting every Friday night for prayer services and Sabbath meals at dedicated premises in Warsaw's embassy row.

Beit Warszawa caters primarily to Poles who have discovered their Jewish roots and want to explore them, if only fleetingly and tentatively.

Rabbis aim to rebuild community

"We have between 50 and 80 people for Shabbes services," said Ashkenazy. "They're not the same people all the time. We have 600 to 800 people on our list, though they're not members."

Apart from Friday night and High Holiday services, Beit Warszawa supplies rabbinical services to such cities as Krakow, Lublin and Chelm; offers courses in Judaism, Hebrew and Yiddish; hosts cultural events, and performs conversions.

"We respond to the needs of the community," said Ashkenazy. "That's what we do."

Rabbi Segal joined Beit Warszawa as a travelling rabbi after her ordination at Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem.

Working in tandem with Rabbi Schuman, she was given the task of rebuilding progressive Judaism in a nation where three million Jews were murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices.

She cut a distinctive figure as she conducted Sabbath services strumming her guitar. As a woman, she didn't encounter resistance, she said in an interview. "I've always had very positive reactions. I was asked a lot of questions, some surprising, some sensible."

Recently, Rabbi Segal left Beit Warszawa after a series of disputes with Rabbi Schuman, and currently, she is in the midst of creating a Reform community in Krakow and studying Polish at Jagiellonian University.

Many of her congregants are "new" Jews – Catholic Poles who've stumbled upon their Jewish heritage and are pursuing it to one degree or another.

"I try to help them find their identity and teach them traditions and how to live Jewishly."

Rabbi Segal said she's on friendly terms with Polish Chief Rabbi Michael Schudrich and that they both share a common objective: rebuilding a community that was decimated by the Holocaust.

"Our job is to give space to people who want to live Jewish lives. It's a process of development."

Born in Moscow and raised in a secular Jewish household with a strong Jewish identity, she began working as an actor and singer in Moscow's Jewish theatre, often accompanying herself on the guitar.

Her involvement with the theatre, as well as her personal experiences with anti-Semitism, strengthened her Jewish background.

During the late 1980s, she completed her studies in stage direction at the Russian Academy of Theatre Arts.

She and her then-two-year-old son, Benyamin, made aliyah in the spring of 1991, shortly after the end of the Gulf War. She earned a living as a theatre actress and as a Russian-Hebrew translator of books on Jewish themes.

In 1999, she went to Riga, Latvia, to teach Jewish history at a Jewish school. Upon returning to Israel, she enrolled at Hebrew Union College for rabbinical studies.

"My decision to become a rabbi was the culmination of a profound process of addressing the Jewish dimension of my life," she explained. "I see my life as a continuous search for my Jewish identity."

At the same time, she studied Jewish philosophy, mainly Kabbalah, at Tel Aviv University.

Thanks to a project for rabbinical students sponsored by Israel's ministry of education, she went to Ukraine to help support Jewish communities there.

En route back to Israel, she stopped in Warsaw. "I was very excited being in a place of great rabbis and scholars. I felt something. I wanted to live and work in Poland, and I followed my intuitions."

Late in 2007, she started working for Beit Warszawa, her son supporting her decision to leave Israel. In the meantime, he is finishing his compulsory service in the Israeli army.

Beyond the next few years she plans to spend in Krakow, Rabbi Segal has no idea what lies ahead. But she likes Poland and believes there is much to be done here in rebuilding a Jewish community that is seriously resurrecting itself.

'New' Jew directs Warsaw's sole Jewish day school

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

WARSAW — Maciej (Mati) Pawlak, 32, has come a long way.

Raised in an atheist household, he didn't even know he was Jewish until he was a teenager. Today, he is the director of Warsaw's only Jewish day school, as well as the first Polish citizen since the Holocaust to become a rabbi and remain in Poland.

"I suspected I had Jewish roots," said Rabbi Pawlak, the director of the Lauder-Morasha School, a middle school and kindergarten funded by the U.S.-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation. "I was the only kid in school who didn't attend Catholic religious classes."

Ordained at Yeshiva University, Rabbi Pawlak was born in Szczecin, in northwestern Poland, when it was still under the sway of Communism.

His mother, Alina, was Jewish, and his father, Zbigniew, a sailor, was a Catholic.

"There was basically no religion in my home," he said in an interview. "My family story is similar to many other family stories in Poland. I know many people like myself."

He thinks his parents concealed his Jewishness from him for so long because they didn't want to make him feel different in a staunchly Catholic society or expose him to anti-Semitism.

But when he was 14, his mother, a native of Lodz, finally told him the truth. "Maybe she thought I was ready. She confirmed what I suspected. It was a good feeling."

He also discovered that his late grandparents had escaped from the Nazi ghetto in Lodz and that his father's family had sought refuge in the Soviet Union during World War II.

Rabbi Maciej Pawlak

In 1992, his mom sent him to a Lauder summer camp in southern Poland to explore Judaism. "I knew zero about Judaism when I went there. I made many friends and returned to the camp."

Meanwhile, he visited the synagogue in his hometown, whose registered Jewish population today stands at about 30.

After graduating from high school, he studied at a yeshiva in Israel. "My parents were supportive. They realized I was doing something I wanted."

Returning to Poland, he took business courses at a college in Warsaw.

'I want to do something for the Jewish community'

The Israel-based Shavei Israel organization helped him, a new Jew, continue his Jewish education in New York City. Michael Schudrich, the chief rabbi of Poland, encouraged him in his endeavours.

A symbol of the revival of Jewish life in Poland since the collapse of communism two decades ago, Rabbi Pawlak was appointed director of the Lauder-Morasha School in 2006.

A Jewish seniors' home before 1939, the school opened in 1994 in a ceremony attended by the prime minister and the mayor of Warsaw. In his speech, the prime minister described the school as "magnificent proof" of Poland's Jewish revival since the advent of democracy in 1989.

On the first day of its existence, the school had 18 pupils, but it now has an enrolment of more than 200 students between the ages of three and 16 and a staff of close to 50 teachers.

The majority of its students, including Rabbi Pawlak's daughter, are Jewish, but almost 40 per cent are Catholic, and some of them are of Jewish ancestry. "There are people who don't want to be part of the Jewish community, but who want to give their children some Jewish education," he explained.

Combing preschool, primary and middle schools, the school offers secular and Jewish studies and is accredited by the Polish ministry of education.

It is part of a network of Lauder-supported Jewish schools, youth centres, summer camps and an educational retreat in Poland.

Rabbi Schudrich, who is Rabbi Pawlak's mentor, said that foreign funders such as the Lauder foundation have played an integral role in reviving Jewish life in Poland.

"The revival could not have happened without the support of these foundations," he said in an interview.

Rabbi Pawlak, whose wife is an Israeli who is originally from Poland, has not decided whether he will remain in Poland.

"I don't know what the future will bring, but in the meantime, I want to stay here and do something for the Jewish community, which has changed since I was a boy. Many people are surprised that there is something going on Jewishly in Poland."

Chevra kadisha provides deceased with dignified treatment

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Jewish communities around the world, small groups of people gather together to perform the final rites that confer a measure of dignity on those whose time on earth has passed.

These chevra kadisha, or holy burial societies, are often volunteer organizations that perform the mitzvah of preparing bodies for burial in a dignified manner, in conformity with Jewish law and tradition.

This chesed shel emes (a true act of loving kindness) "is an an extremely important mitzvah," explained Jettie (pronounced Yettie) Schochet, co-ordinator of the women's chevra kadisha in Toronto. "It's called chesed shel emes, as for this kindness you don't get paid back by the person who dies."

The women's chevra kadisha was functioning far before she began her association with it 30 years ago, Schochet said. It was initiated by Cookie Attias, who now lives in Israel, and it organized an informal group of women who had made themselves available to prepare women's bodies for burial.

The women's chevra kadisha is the only burial society in Toronto geared specifically to the needs of Orthodox women. However, many shuls, including Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, operate their own chevra kadishas, while the two large funeral chapels, Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel and Steeles Memorial Chapel, have their own staff to perform this crucial function.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, said burial societies are an ancient component of Jewish communities. "There's a tradition of burying our own and doing it on a volunteer basis while maintaining the customs of the community," he said.

"It's a community that takes care of its own in the final moment. It defines the community. They are doing it on behalf of their congregation," the rabbi added.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler

The chevra kadisha at the Shaarei Shomayim is called upon 20 to 25 times a year. Its function is threefold: to guard the body (performed by shomrim, meaning guards) and say tehillim (Psalms) over it; to perform tahara (cleansing and purification); and tachrichim (dressing the body in vestments).

Some 20 male congregants are members of the shul's chevra kadisha, Rabbi Strauchler said, while Schochet said she has a list of as many as 80 women from across the Orthodox community to call on, though only about 30 are currently active.

Marc Benjamin, vice-president of Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, said the chapel often receives the first call made by a surviving family member.

"We tell the family that the only thing they need to think about is each other. We assist with any issue when death occurs," he said, including preparation of the body, provision of shomrim, contacting clergy, arranging government documentation, providing limousine service and police escorts.

About 60 per cent of those who use the chapel's services already own burial plots. The chapel can assist the remaining 40 per cent in the purchase of a resting place "at a moment's notice," Benjamin said.

Shomrim recite psalms and never leave the body. "The belief is that the soul hovers over the body until burial, so they recite psalms to comfort the soul."

The chapel maintains its own chevra kadisha of Orthodox men and women who prepare the body in accordance with Halachah and custom.

Even those who are indigent or have no family are given a decent burial, Benjamin said. In those cases, the City of Toronto covers one-third of the funeral cost, while Benjamin's covers the rest.

Rabbi Strauchler said that as the spiritual leader of his congregation, he often receives the first call from a family inquiring into the procedures for burial. The shul's chevra kadisha works in co-operation with the funeral homes to ensure all necessary procedures are followed, although Rabbi Strauchler advises that family members have a role to play before this service kick in.

It's a "special mitzvah to close the eyes of the departed," he said, with that task usually falling to the children. In addition, the body should be lowered in the bed or to the ground. The body must not be left alone until it is picked up and it is customary to light a candle on death. All water in cups or jugs are to be poured out as well – a discrete signal to neighbours that the family has suffered a loss.

These traditions date back centuries and are part of offering final dignities to the departed, Rabbi Strauchler explained.

From Abdul to Zolf, book tells the story of Manitoba Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Quick now, admit it. You know somebody from Winnipeg. Everybody does. Like the proverbial wandering Jew, they seem to be everywhere. There may even still be a few back in the 'Peg.

The demographics of the city's Jewish population have been changing, marked by the departure of scores of young people and their replacement by immigrants from Argentina, Russia and Brazil.

With the realization that the city's Jewish population was aging, a few community leaders decided a few years ago that it was time to put the city's rich history on the record.

Historian Allan Levine

Lawyer Abe Anhang was one of those leaders, and, along with the late Harold Buchwald, he put in motion a process that culminated recently with the publication of a glossy coffee-table book that is the most complete record to date of the community's storied history.

Titled Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, the book is highly accessible to the average reader while containing no shortage of historical detail. Winnipeggers in particular will enjoy the book, no doubt because they're bound to be in it or know someone who is.

Written by accomplished historian Allan Levine, the book tells the stories of the community's residents and their involvement in business, politics, the labour movement, Zionism, education and religion.

"I wanted to write a book that people would enjoy reading," Levine explained.

The community's movers and shakers get their time in the sun, but so do many lesser lights. Just about every Winnipegger will have a connection to some institution or event referenced in the book, and its trip down memory lane is so complete it even includes a description of the boardwalk at Winnipeg Beach, a summer getaway area north of Winnipeg.

Readers who ventured to "the lake" every summer will recall the boardwalk amusement park and giant roller-coaster operated by businessman Harry Silverberg, along with the Playland pinball emporium nearby.

But Winnipeg Beach came later in the community's development. When the first Jewish immigrants arrived, summer cottages were far from their minds. Survival was their primary concern.

The city's first Jewish settlers in the 1880s were faced with circumstances that were difficult at best, tragic at worst.

The east European immigrants (they were preceded by much smaller number of German and English Jews) were housed in shacks near the forks of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, the centre of modern-day Winnipeg. There, with barely enough to eat and with minimal shelter from -40 degree temperatures, several infants died.

But the immigrants persevered, and within 20 years, they became prominent in business and even city politics, Levine noted. These people established the foundation for a community that acquired a reputation for accomplishment and cultural vitality that its relatively small numbers – at three per cent of the provincial population – would hardly have warranted.

Levine, author of Fugitives of the Forest, the story of the Bielski partisans during World War II, said he was surprised to find during his research the extent of the anti-Semitism faced by the Jews of Manitoba.

"It was not like Europe," he said, "but the restrictions on Jews from the 1880s to the 1960s were pretty phenomenal."

Along with the city's relative isolation, anti-Semitism contributed to the community's internal cohesion and self-sufficiency, he added.

The first Jewish immigrants gravitated to the north end of the city, just across the CPR tracks in an area that would come to be known as "new Jerusalem." Even then, a friendly rivalry developed with south end Jews – one that persists to this day.

Between 1901 and 1911, the city's Jewish population grew from 1,156 to 9,023, and most lived in slum conditions in the north end. Although Jewish numbers peaked at only 20,000 to 25,000 in the 1960s (it now stands around 12,000 to 15,000), many would go on to achieve wider fame.

John Hirsch, a refugee from Hungary, helped establish the city's famed Manitoba Theatre Centre before serving as artistic director of the Stratford Shakespeare Festival in Ontario.

Monty Halperin (later Hall), after repeatedly being rejected from medical school because he was a Jew, earned fame in Hollywood as host of the TV game show Let's Make A Deal.

Other prominent Manitobans include Philip Kives, originally from the Sonnefeld agricultural colony in Saskatchewan, who founded the K-Tel brand which made famous a stable of products ranging from patty stackers to the legendary Veg-O-Matic; community leader Sol Kanee; Sidney Spivak, onetime leader of the provincial Conservative Party; writer Miriam Waddington; Allan Gotlieb, a Canadian ambassador to the United States; journalist Larry Zolf; Hersh Lerner, Canadian curling champion; Harold Buchwald, lawyer and onetime head of the Canada-Israel Committee; businessman Gerry Schwartz; tycoon Ben Hatskin, who lured Bobby Hull to the upstart World Hockey Association's Winnipeg Jets; Izzy Asper, founder of CanWest Global Communications; and Manitoba Chief Justice Samuel Freedman.

Even entertainer Paula Abdul has a Manitoba connection. Her grandfather, William Rykiss, hailed from the small town of Minnedosa, near Winnipeg. And singer/composer Burton Cummings is Jewish, too – well, not really, but he did date a Jewish girl once.

Coming of Age*, published by the Jewish Heritage Centre

Levine does not spare the sensitivities of his Winnipeg readers, even including a couple of notorious events – the Chicago Kosher or "Winnipeg treif" scandal and the allegations of sexual abuse levelled at a rabbi.

Anhang said the inspiration for the book was the realization that the community was aging, and it was important to record their stories while there was still time.

"Winnipeg is transforming big time," he said. "We've had a huge influx of immigrants that are changing the look of our community. These people come here [from Argentina, Russia, Brazil], and they don't know anything about what went on here. Zero."

Coming of Age was published by the Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) of Western Canada and designed by co-publisher Heartland Associates. It's illustrated with hundreds of photos from the JHC archives, and it cost some $400,000 to produce.

"We did it right," Anhang said.

The book is a bestseller in Winnipeg, and onetime residents of the river city from as far afield as Israel, Washington and New York have been e-mailing Levine about it.

It's even paying dividends in his own backyard. "I'm a really popular guy in the locker room at the Rady [Jewish Community] Centre. All the old guys like talking to me," he said.

Abayudaya Jews deliver relief to famine-plagued Ugandans

By LORNE MALLIN
JTA

After four hours of driving on ever tunier roads this morning, our food truck becomes stuck in the sand and we have to push it out. We are following the packed pickup in Rabbi Gershom Sizomu's SUV – four members of his Abayudaya Jewish congregation, two Ugandan TV reporters and me, a semi-retired Canadian journalist volunteering with the Abayudaya.

Just then we see thatch-roofed mud huts in the distance under a bright blue sky dotted with puffy clouds. We see people gathered under a large tree. The high-pitched trill of ululation greets our arrival at last in Acegerekinei, a remote village in northeastern Uganda.

We begin unloading the 2,420 pounds of food relief we have donated to hungry families among the estimated three million Ugandans facing starvation in a worsening famine. I was happy to have contributed 220 pounds of corn flour.

The Ugandan government says there are food shortages in 52 districts in the north and east brought on by drought and other factors. Nearly 40 people have died of hunger-related complications in the East African nation of about 32 million.

Rabbi Sizomu says he wants to act before the numbers grow worse, before a high death count is needed to trigger a response. He received ordination in the Conservative movement last summer after a year studying in Israel and four years at the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the American Jewish University in Los Angeles. He became the first ordained black rabbi in sub-Saharan Africa.

"Central to our Jewish values is saving lives," he tells the 65 families sitting on the ground in the shade of the tree. "We wish you well, and we pray that God brings this to an end."

Rabbi Sizomu is responding to a village elder who thanked the Abayudaya for coming "and for rescuing us." Acegerekinei is in Katakwi, one of the 17 hardest-hit districts that the government says are experiencing famine.

The villagers all clutch cards from the Ugandan Red Cross, which is helping co-ordinate relief, entitling them to a share of the corn flour and beans that the Abayudaya trucked north from their home in the Mbale district near the Kenyan border. The Abayudaya first embraced Judaism in the 1920s and now include about 1,000 members in several Ugandan villages.

The Red Cross chose the most vulnerable in Acegerekinei to receive relief – the elderly, the disabled and those suffering from HIV/AIDS. They line up as best they can; some are in wheelchairs fashioned out of plastic lawn chairs.

Each receives about 33 pounds of corn flour to make corn porridge and the staple dish called posho, plus about 3.3 pounds of beans. Each pound of corn flour is about enough for a meal for three people.

"Our community responded overwhelmingly to the call to donate," Rabbi Sizomu says. "Everybody wanted to help."

The response is considerable from a community that mostly lives on subsistence farming. Though the Mbale district has less rain than normal, crops are still growing.

"I believe that life takes precedence over everything," the rabbi says. "God is not going to stretch out His hand physically, so we are extensions of God's arm."

I notice that we are here just hours before the Jewish holiday Tisha b'Av, when practising Jews fast for a day. We have the luxury of turning on and turning off our food consumption.

The rabbi's son, Igaal, 15, helps distribute the food we brought.

"It felt good to donate," he says. "If we get hungry, maybe there would be others who would help us."

More relief is coming; more food was collected than the truck could hold. And on this morning, students visiting the Abayudaya from the California Institute of the Arts of Los Angeles donated $190.

Food stylist makes time for volunteering

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Debbi Charendoff Moses, on location for a television food commercial shoot four months ago, was dressed for comfort.

Her highlighted hair was pulled back in a ponytail, and her face was bare of makeup. A black apron embroidered in hot pink with the words "Food Styling by Debbi Moses" – protected her T-shirt and black jeans, and the Nikes on her feet provided cushioning against the hard floor.

The next day, sipping a freshly brewed cappuccino in her leafy backyard, the Toronto food stylist explained that comfortable attire is a necessity in her business. It's not unheard of for someone in her line of work – whose job it is to make food look appealing for the camera – to put in a 12-hour day for a 30-second commercial.

The late April shoot was particularly hectic, because the subject of the commercial was Chapman's ice cream.

Although concocting inedible fake ice cream that won't melt under hot camera lights is one of the tricks of Moses' trade, the Chapman's commercial used the real thing. It featured 70 actors tasting the company's product.

Moses and her crew, which included five students, oversaw speedy distribution of the frozen desserts from a refrigerated truck immediately before the shoot.

"If you don't have the right conditions for ice cream, it's tough," she said, noting that dry ice is helpful.

To ensure that the food she styles looks the way she wants it to, Moses travels with an arsenal of likely and unlikely equipment packed in fishing tackle boxes, toolboxes and large plastic bins.

"You have to be ready for anything," she said.

Wire to smooth the surface of the ice cream – a tool she used originally as a ceramicist – is at hand if she needs it. A clothes steamer might be used for another job, to create the look of steam when she is working with hot foods.

Her more conventional kitchen tools include pastry brushes, spatulas, pots, pans, bowls and measuring cups.

A home economist and teacher by profession, Moses spent time as a potter when she was a young mother living in the United States. She studied pottery at what is now the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, at the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue.

"I love to dabble in the arts," said Moses, who has taken classes on painting furniture and floorcloths as well. She enjoys knitting, and also fashions women's kippot from wire, beads and pearls.

Among her community involvements, Moses has volunteered in Israel for Sar-El. She has also housed a youth emissary from Israel, who spent most of the past year at Holy Blossom Temple, and served as a committee member helping choose the next group of emissaries.

Prior to that, Moses has prepared and served food for Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program.

Food styling was a natural outgrowth of her dual expertise in art and food.

"I always loved preparing food for my family when I was young," Moses told The CJN.

To a large extent, she is self-taught, in part from necessity. When she began her career, there were no courses on the subject in Toronto, she recalls.

One of her first jobs was preparing a hot dog for an advertisement that was seen on the side of a bus. "It had to have perfect grill marks and a perfect swoosh of mustard and the perfect bun," she recalls.

Moses believes that presenting food with eye appeal is doable for most home cooks.

However, even the food she makes at her own home doesn't look like the food she prepares for photography. "If I'm bringing out a tray of tomato salad, I'm not going to bring out paint brushes and paint oil onto the vegetables to make it look juicier or more succulent, and I wouldn't spray it with water."

Successful food stylists need both cooking knowledge and an artistic eye, Moses said.

As well, she added, "You need patience to work with a team, because there's always a new team of people [at every job]. You have to think on your feet and be resourceful."

My friend and teacher Allen

By BERNIE M. FARBER

From time to time in one's life, a memory is evoked that seems to have glued itself to our unconscious for its very power and intensity. Such a memory came vividly to life recently when a dear friend and teacher told me that this would be his last year teaching.

It was a cold, rainy, almost sad-looking day in April 1992 when our plane descended onto the runway of Warsaw's then small, utilitarian airport. It was, in a way, fitting weather for the start of the second March of the Living.

The march is today a yearly gathering of young Jewish teenagers from around the world who travel to Poland and Israel to connect with their past, present and future. They do so by visiting some of the worst places in their imaginations – the death camps of the Holocaust, which in many ways define modern Jewish history – and then head to the Jewish homeland, Israel, to find redemption in their people's ability to not just survive, but thrive despite Nazi efforts to destroy them.

On board the plane with me and my wife, who were acting with others as madrichim (counsellors), were a mishmash of Jewish teens from across Canada, anxiously anticipating what would be a difficult, but ultimately rewarding and inspiring, journey.

We spent the first two days of our trip in Warsaw and Lublin, nervously considering how we would respond when we would visit Majdanek, the first in a series of Nazi death camps on our itinerary. The day we arrived there was strangely warm and sunny, a day most Poles were unaccustomed to in mid-April. But the bright sun and the warm weather could not take the chill from our souls as we drove through the gates of the camp and then looked ahead to see the only homicidal gas chamber preserved in its original condition.

Bernie Farber

We were struck by the fact that, like the original gas chamber, everything was perfectly in place, just as it was when the camp was operational – the barracks, the grounds, the crematorium and the barbed wire fence. A large, circular mausoleum memorial stands at the end of the former "black path" to the crematorium, a walkway that is now called the Road of Homage. Under the dome is a gigantic circular urn, shaped like a saucer, which contains the ashes of some of Majdanek's Jewish victims. In the centre, the inscription reads, "Let our fate be a warning to you."

We broke into different groups to explore the grounds and decided to meet back in the central square in one hour. Most of us returned on time. The last group of teens to return shuffled slowly to the square. We could tell by the look in their collective eyes that something was not quite right. David, a gangly 17-year-old stepped forward. In his hand was something that looked like small pieces of granite. But the pieces were not granite. They were human bones found in the fields of Majdanek.,

We were all overwhelmed with waves of deep despair. We needed to say Kaddish and chant the Kel Maleh Rachamim (a memorial hymn), but who in this crowd had the cantorial skill to pay proper respect to this haunting tribute to the dead?

At that moment, out stepped one of the other counsellors. Slender, blonde and blue-eyed, he didn't have the typical Jewish appearance. His name was Allen Manly. "I can chant the Kel Maleh Rachamim," he said quietly.

To a person, we were all skeptical.

Who was this Allen Manly? As a high school English teacher from Thornhill who also taught gym and coached volleyball, how could he, of all people, chant this most sacred of prayers and do proper justice to the bones that once belonged to a Jewish man, woman or child?

Allen moved forward. We placed the bones gingerly in a handkerchief. We all took turns digging a small grave and carefully placed the remnants of a Jewish victim of the Nazis into the ground. With a small black yarmulke on his head contrasting dramatically with his deep blonde hair, Allen looked at us, looked at the grave and, without the benefit of a siddur, began to chant the Kel Maleh Rachamim by memory.

We weren't prepared for the soulful, tone-perfect rendition we heard. From the voice of this blonde-haired, blue-eyed gym teacher came a holy tribute that seemed to cry to the heavens.

When he finished, Allen turned to the small gathering. We all held each other, cried and were transformed that day. Thanks to Allen Manly, we were now all linked spiritually not only to one another, but also with those who lost their lives in that dreadful place. Our neshamah (soul) became one with them.

Allen Manly, teacher, friend, taught us all a very valuable lesson that day, one we have not forgotten.

Last June, Allen retired from teaching.

Rebick manages Food Shares's kitchen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"We work from the farm to the home," explained Alvin Rebick. "Our slogan is good healthy food for all."

Rebick is talking about Food Share, a non-profit food security and social justice organization that promotes healthy eating through community-based programs.

Funded by the federal and provincial governments as well as private and public organizations, Food Share works on a wide variety of food issues, from the growing, processing and distribution of food to its purchase, cooking and consumption.

Rebick, a communal farmer and a restaurateur for 30 years, is Food Share's kitchen manager.

Although he no longer cultivates crops and manages restaurants, he is doing what he knows best. "I'm still feeding people," he said in an interview.

Since he is charge of the kitchen, the heart of Food Share, Rebick, 60, is also involved in its grassroots projects.

And they are impressive.

Baby Food Making, geared to new mothers, offers workshops in eight languages on how to prepare and store infants' food.

Community Gardens and Urban Agriculture, through a model vegetable garden at its headquarters in western Toronto, encourages neighbourhoods to start garden plots and thereby provide access to healthy and affordable food throughout the city.

The Focus on Food Youth Intern Program helps at-risk youth develop skills in finance, computers, nutrition, diversity and conflict resolution.

The Good Food Box, Good Food Markets and Fresh Produce Program delivers top-quality fresh produce to all.

Kitchen, Cooking and Catering Program prepares and serves fresh, affordable and multiculturally sensitive food to staff, volunteers and guests; operates a catering business and a test kitchen, and makes nutrient-dense "power" soups for the homeless.

Field to Table Schools and Student Nutrition helps ensure that about 89,000 children and youth in Toronto have access to culturally appropriate breakfasts, snacks and lunches in more than 700 student nutrition programs at schools and community centres.

Not surprisingly, Food Share has collaborated with the local Jewish community. "Food is close to the Jewish heart, as it is to mine," he said.

In collaboration with Food Share, Jewish Family & Child Service launched a Good Food Box program and a community garden at Bathurst Street and Finch Avenue.

Kitchen food share entrance

Rebick, a former 1960s hippie, feels very much at home at Food Share. As he put it, "A lot of my ideals go back to the farm I worked on. What Food Share is all about comes from this experience."

Born in New York City and raised in Montreal and Toronto like his social and political activist sister, Judy Rebick - he was one of 13 people who founded a communal farm in the Ottawa Valley near the town of Pembroke.

"We wanted to change society, to create a different kind of life," Rebick said. "It wasn't jaded or cynical, but hopeful. It was a back-to-the-land situation, without plumbing or electricity."

"But it may have been foolish," he added. "We were going against the grain."

He and his friends cultivated vegetables and kept chickens, and on cold nights, they stoked the furnace.

Working in the kitchen, he learned the fundamentals of mass feeding, a skill that would keep him gainfully employed once he left the communal farm and continued his studies.

Rebick studied horticulture at the University of Guelph, thinking he would work in that industry.

For a while, he indeed earned a livelihood in horticulture. But soon, a new career in the restaurant business beckoned, first in Guelph and then in Ottawa.

He bought an existing restaurant, the Baker Street Bistro, and it was successful. Buoyed by its success, Rebick opened Timers, a small family restaurant.

He sold both after 10 years and moved to Ottawa, where he started Grenville's restaurant.

Falling on hard times, Rebick went back to Guelph and successively managed the Bookshelf Cafe and Bistro 6, his last restaurant. Weary of small-town living, and hungering for more of a cosmopolitan milieu, he returned to Toronto.

"I was introduced to Food Share and, fortunately, I was hired. It's a great organization."

In retrospect, he has come full circle, from growing food to working collectively for the greater good.

"I'm using the skills I acquired over 30 years," Rebick said. "It's energizing and purposeful. I feel very fortunate to have discovered Food Share."

Technology transforming genealogy research

By HILLEL KUTTLER
JTA

In genealogy research, crumbling documents and high-speed Internet connections often go hand in hand.

So it goes for Schelly Talalay Dardashti, who focuses on Jewish genealogy as a researcher, journalist, blogger and international speaker.

At a workshop she ran a few years ago in Barcelona on the role of technology in conducting genealogy research, Dardashti met a former attorney, Maria Jose Surribas. Surribas now works as a freelance archivist and has helped Dardashti research her roots in the Colombian town of Lenda.

Dardashti can now trace her family there to 1353, to Moshe Talalaya, a kosher winemaker.

"If not for technology, we'd be doing what we used to: dealing with the dust and the creepy-crawlies, like Maria does in Spain, wearing a face mask," said Dardashti, who is based in Tel Aviv. "Technology has made it possible for people interested in the same topics to share, collaborate and learn."

The ever-expanding research opportunities made possible by technology was a central theme at the recent conference in Philadelphia of the International Association of Jewish Genealogy Societies, which drew nearly 900 people.

Last year's conference session on using Google for genealogy research proved so popular that three Google sessions were held this time.

Speakers, including representatives of companies specializing in technology-assisted genealogy, covered such matters as constructing digital family trees and sharing them online, searching databases, choosing genealogy software, collaborating with other researchers via social networking sites and utilizing face-recognition technology to identify relatives in photographs.

"Until now, history and genealogy, which are related, are things that old people were said to be doing," said Daniel Horowitz, manager of genealogy and translations for My Heritage, an Israeli software and web company that operates in 36 languages.

That reality is changing, he said, as modern tools make learning about the past cooler.

"Definitely, technology plays a very important role in bringing young people into genealogy," Horowitz said. "Once the computer and technology are used to research or share information, young people are attracted to it. The [number] of young people getting involved in things like Facebook – it's incredible. In Israel, there's a Facebook for kids 12 to 15 years old. That's a very good catch to bring young people into genealogy."

While few teenagers and 20-somethings attended the conference, some spoke of their young children catching the genealogy bug.

Barbara and Richard Wissokur came from Boston with their daughter, Amy Wissokur Graham, a Philadelphia librarian. When Barbara periodically updates the family database, she e-mails Amy, who shares the information with her three children for their class assignments.

"They've been working on this so long," Amy said of her parents, "that my mother is counting on me to move this forward."

Technology has proven itself to Ruth Epstein-Glicksberg and her husband, Moshe, retirees in Haifa. Ruth has compiled much of her family's history by hand on assorted scraps of paper. She started transferring the data onto a computer program, Family Tree Maker, but said she is thinking of switching to My Heritage's Family Tree Builder after hearing a session about it at the conference.

"It's terrible because it's a mess," she said of her scattered notes. "It's lots of work, it's inefficient and it's not organized. This computer program is good for me because it gives me many possibilities to organize my material and search other databases. Technology triggers the possibilities for genealogy."

The couple has already visited Salt Lake City twice to search the vast Mormon collection of microfilmed European records. Ruth perused thousands of documents and discovered death records for her grandparents and other relatives.

Moshe does Internet research of people whose names are written on the back of old family photographs. To learn more about the branch of his family that left Belarus and Lithuania for the United States, he often conducts online searches of U.S. census records and the Social Security Death Index.

New opportunities continue to open up

The International Tracing Service archives in Bad Aronson, Germany, is a font of newly declassified information. My Heritage now links researchers to 1,536 databases around the world.

Ancestry.com says it spends millions of dollars per year digitizing records that can be searched online. Even before records are indexed, said the company's indexing manager, Crista Cowan, Ancestry.com users can browse such digitized documents as naturalization papers much in the same way as scrolling microfilm spools.

Many software programs also enable you to post family trees online, and thus allow relatives to share and edit each other's information. For privacy reasons, users can restrict access to the trees, and some sites limit what information can be viewed.

"What all this means is, if you have an Internet connection and are sitting in a yurt in Mongolia, you can find out information," Dardashti said. "What we always say is, if you don't find what you're looking for today, try tomorrow."

Olmert charged for alleged corruption

By OFRA EDELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — For the first time in the history of the State of Israel, a person who sat in the prime minister's chair will also sit in the defendant's dock.

The State Prosecution filed charges Sunday against former prime minister Ehud Olmert, attributing to him a litany of violations that include accepting bribes, fraud, breach of trust, falsifying documents and income tax evasion.

Olmert's attorneys said late Sunday following news of his indictment that the prosecution had no evidence of the gravest charges against him, particularly bribe taking, money laundering or theft.

"The indictment proves to us just how right we were to refuse to attend a hearing with the attorney general and the state prosecution," wrote his attorneys in response to the indictment.

The corruption trial is expected to last up to four years, without taking into account possible appeals at the Supreme Court. A panel of justices at the Jerusalem district court will likely deliberate over Olmert's case twice a week.

First time ever a former prime minister indicted

The indictment focuses on three investigations against Olmert for which he was questioned by police: the Talansky Affair, Rishon Tours, and the Investment Center. The charges also refer to false declarations made to the State Comptroller regarding funds he received from a U.S. citizen and an assessment of the value of his pen collection.

Olmert's former bureau chief, Shula Zaken, was also indicted with similar charges. She is accused of wiretapping Olmert's conversations with politicians and ministers, without his knowledge.

According to the indictment filed by state prosecutor Moshe Lador, Jerusalem district prosecutor Eli Abarbanel and attorney Uri Corb, Olmert and Zaken abused his political position "in systematic and drawn-out activities for financial benefits... in different ways and from different sources... all in manners that contravened the law, the norms and the rules that obligate a minister and a public servant."

The first charge relates to the Rishon Tours case. Olmert is accused of claiming double and triple reimbursement from public organizations and from the state during the years 2002 to 2006 for trips he took on their behalf.

In this way he is believed to have pocketed $92,164 US. The cash and the frequent flyer mileage he accumulated were used for his private trips abroad, as well as for his family and the upgrading of their flights.

In order to be able to make the false claims, Olmert and Zaken allegedly got Rishon Tours to issue fictitious receipts to the organizations that were covering the expenses of the flights.

The News in Brief

Canada

Man Back in Court

REGINA — A former University of Saskatchewan math lecturer who faces charges of posting anti-Semitic messages online was back in court last month for allegedly breaching a condition of his original release by posting a message July 22 on the Internet. The nature of the posting wasn't detailed when Terrence Tremaine, 61, appeared in provincial court Aug. 7. He's slated to go on trial this fall for allegedly posting anti-Semitic messages on a white supremacist website from 2004 to 2007, the Regina Leader-Post reported.

Mock To Seek Seat

TORONTO — Karen Mock, former head of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, said last week she'll seek the federal Liberal nomination in the riding of Thornhill, with the aim of defeating incumbent Tory Peter Kent in an election that could come this fall. Mock made the announcement after the Liberal riding association announced that Susan Kadis, a former Vaughan councillor and Liberal MP for Thornhill from 2004 until she was defeated by Kent, a former broadcaster, in 2008, won't seek the nomination. Kadis is backing Mock, who is also a former head of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

Bankruptcy Sought

TORONTO — The receiver of a defunct hedge fund is seeking to have its co-founder declared bankrupt in order to locate funds he may have moved outside the country. KPMG wants a court to declare Toronto resident Boaz Manor bankrupt, because it would give it more power than a regular court order to find assets, the Globe and Mail reported. Portus Alternative Asset Management Inc. was shut down by regulators in 2005 amid allegations its assets were invested improperly. Manor fled to Israel, but returned in 2007 to face fraud and other charges. His trial is slated to start in September 2010. Some $700 million has been repaid to investors, but Manor faces rulings to repay $17 million in funds that haven't been located, including $9 million worth of diamonds he took to Israel but says he no longer has.

World

'Analyzer' Guilty

NEW YORK — Israeli hacker Ehud Tenenbaum pleaded guilty in a New York court last month to one count of bank-card fraud for his part in a hacking scheme that U.S. officials say netted some $10 million from U.S. banks. Tenenbaum, 29, known as the "Analyzer," was arrested in Canada last year with three other hackers for allegedly stealing about $1.5 million from Canadian banks. But he was put on trial in the United States after officials asked to have him extradited. He'll be sentenced Nov. 17 and faces up to five years in jail. He first became known in 1998 when he was arrested at age 19 with several other Israelis and two U.S. teens after hacking into computers belonging to NASA, the Pentagon and the Knesset.

Philanthropist Dies

NEW YORK — Stanley Kaplan, founder of Kaplan prep centres for standardized tests and a prolific Jewish philanthropist, died Aug. 23 at age 90. Kaplan, who founded the Stanley H. Kaplan Educational Centers Ltd., gave four- and five-figure gifts to a wide array of Jewish causes. He sold the business in 1984 to the Washington Post Company.

Kennedy Recalled Fondly By Jews

WASHINGTON — U.S. Senator Edward Kennedy is being remembered by U.S. Jews for his huge impact on domestic issues such as education and health care, but also as a giant in the Soviet Jewry movement.

The Massachusetts Democrat "was one of the earliest, strongest champions on behalf of Soviet Jewry," said Mark Levin, executive director of NCSJ: Advocates on Behalf of Jews in Russia, Ukraine, the Baltic States and Eurasia. "He was always proactive and didn't wait for NCSJ and other organizations to come to him – he was always looking to see where he could make a difference."

In his 2006 book, The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror, former Refusenik and Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky said Kennedy was the first western politician to meet with Refuseniks "in a midnight meeting that was kept secret from the KGB until the very last moment."

Levin said that whenever Kennedy met Soviet officials, he would bring lists of those he wanted released. "He never forgot we were talking about individuals and families."

Kennedy also will be remembered as a strong champion of Israel. U.S. Jewish officials noted that he was a stalwart supporter of foreign aid, opposed arms sales to Jordan and Saudi Arabia in the early 1980s, and was a strong backer of recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's capital. He was also a leader in denouncing the Arab boycott of Israel.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called Kennedy "a great friend of Israel," while President Shimon Peres said his death was "a very big loss to every sensitive and thinking person the world over."

Economy down, tuition subsidy requests up

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Even before the economic downturn started last year, the high cost of sending children to Jewish day school was a longstanding issue in the Jewish community.

Dov Rosenblum, president of Netivot HaTorah Day School, told The CJN that "a substantial number" of parents at the school have lost their jobs in the past year. He personally knows "probably eight" of them.

Some of them have decided to start over in Israel, although overall enrolment at Netivot hasn't been affected, Rosenblum said. He added that other newly unemployed parents have requested tuition subsidies for the first time.

Rosenblum noted that tuition subsidy requests have gradually climbed over the past five or so years by approximately five per cent.

"It's a challenge setting tuition – a huge challenge – in this type of economy," he said. The board has to balance "being fair to parents" with "being fair to the education of children.

"It's a hard balance."

For the 2009-10 school year, Netivot's tuition remains the same for preschool, and has increased two per cent for older students (see accompanying article).

"We tried to keep the increase very modest," said Alan Steinfeld, the school's executive director.

The reason for the dearth of dropouts at Netivot applies to other Orthodox day schools as well. "We don't lose students to public school," said Rosenblum. "Our parents are generally pretty dedicated.

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said the biggest challenge day schools face, "without doubt, is the funding challenge."

Paul Shaviv

Shaviv, who now spends part of his time directing the committee that's restructuring UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for the Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz), asks, "How can we sustain the achievements [regarding quality and professionalism] and keep the system affordable and accessible?"

While there has been "some additional noticed pressure on the tuition assistance program" at Toronto day schools, Shaviv said that there has been "no end-of-summer rush of cancellations" of day school enrolment.

"I think the schools will have to over the coming few years call upon the philanthropic resources of the community."

Referring to recent mega-donations benefiting Jewish education – including a $4 million donation to United Synagogue Day School, a $500,000 tuition subsidy donation to Associated Hebrew Schools and a four-year, $4-million tuition subsidy grant to federation – Shaviv noted that "the scale of gifts is really quite substantial, and I think that's a very good sign, but it has to be maintained and increased."

A transfixing historical thriller

When one speaks to Daniel Levin about his debut novel, The Last Ember (Riverhead Books), he immediately sweeps you up in his multiple passions: for writing, the ancient world, historical truth and justice.

In a recent telephone interview, the New York-based author told The CJN that he "set out to write a thriller that would entertain." The word "entertain," however, vastly understates the nature of the reading experience that awaits the reader in The Last Ember.

From the editor's desk...

The experience is more like an adventure.

The story revolves around the efforts of a young international lawyer scholar of classics and ancient history trying to fit together the sharded, broken pieces of an ancient puzzle that dates from the days of the destruction of the Second Temple. It is a puzzle whose solving hold urgent, pressing relevance for modern times.

"I imagined a novel," Levin said, "in which ancient and modern worlds collide, as it does in the antiquities trade."

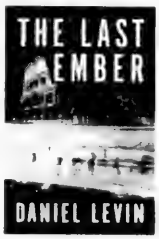
The antiquities trade – in this case the Middle Eastern trade – is the key that unlocks the door onto an exciting, gripping, fast-paced novel that takes the reader to the harrowing, tumultuous world of ancient Judea after the Romans destroyed Jerusalem, to the hopeless lives endured by Jewish slaves in Rome, to the intrigues and conspiracies of ancient Roman politics and to the writings of Josephus, who chronicled it all.

Struggling against time as well as against vicious murderers closing in on him, the young archeologist must correctly decipher the clouded clues of the past if he is to prevent tragedy and calamity quickly racing toward him.

The action in the story shifts seamlessly from Jerusalem to Rome in both present and ancient time. Levin has written a gripping mystery that relates archeological details that, as he assured, "you can count on as being true."

He certainly has the qualifications. Levin studied Roman and Greek civilization as an undergraduate at the University of Michigan and was a visiting scholar at the American Academy in Rome.

Levin also has a law degree from Harvard. He clerked for Dorit Beinisch, the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Israel. It was then that he indulged his archeological interests in and around the Temple Mount and became fascinated with the Wakf, the Muslim religious authority that has had control over the Temple Mount for nearly a millennium.



It was this fascination and the related conundrum of how to investigate, let alone regulate or stop the excavations being conducted by Wakf auspices under the Temple Mount, that were the genesis of The Last Ember.

"The idea that the Israel Antiquities Authority was powerless to stop the excavations captured me intellectually," Levin said. "Archeological material was being destroyed for political purposes."

The super-charged dramatic plot of The Last Ember is a steeplechase of murder, conspiracy, archeology, politics, rescue and redemption. But its substrata theme, Levin told The CJN, is a plea for the preservation of historical record.

"Historical revisionism is the theme I want to bring to life. Historical revisionism," Levin emphasized, "endangers all cultures." He pointed to the destruction of the Buddha statues in Afghanistan by the Taliban as an example.

"What if someone was politically motivated to control the future and the past?" Levin asked rhetorically.

"Everyone agrees that the first step [to peaceful coexistence] is acceptance of truth and tolerance for other people's pasts." It is no coincidence, Levin reminded The CJN, that the same communities that deny the Shoah are also trying to deny the Jewish narrative in the Land of Israel. And thus Levin has created the main contending characters in The Last Ember.

"In some ways, I had my villain before I had my hero," he said. "I wanted to bring the Mufti's [Haj Amin el-Husseini, the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem before and during World War II] maniacal, deadly historic revisionism into the modern day. He was the one who brought the Wakf to begin the destruction of the Jewish past in Israel. Most people do not know that the Mufti recruited some 20,000 Arabs to the SS. He cut a large swath through the Balkans. And he had plans for a concentration camp in Hebron and begged [Adolf] Eichmann to build one there."

The Mufti – and his modern-day inheritors – take aim at the value of remembering. But, as Levin eloquently pleaded over the phone, who, if not the Jewish people, will counter the efforts to destroy memory?

"We, the Jewish people, have a moral imperative to remember. Indeed, our very holidays themselves are celebrations of memory. In that sense, the notion of an ever-glowing ember, a ner tamid, is a natural connection for Jewish readers.

The Last Ember has already been sold in 12 countries. And no wonder. It transfixes the reader. – MBD

UJA campaign 2010 aims to boost fundraising

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite challenges posed by last year's economic downturn, organizers of this year's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto campaign are aiming to raise more than they did last year to meet increased needs, according to Ken Tanenbaum, co-chair for campaign 2010.

"Many lives in our community have been turned upside down by the economic challenges of the past year, but at the same time, we're blessed that most people in the community are still able to give generously," he said at last week's campaign launch.

"UJA has tightened its own belt to ensure that as many dollars as possible go to those in need," Tanenbaum told more than 400 launch participants.

The event, emceed by Elliotte Friedman of CBC's Hockey Night in Canada, was held on the practice court of the Toronto Raptors at the Air Canada Centre, in keeping with the evening's theme of "team."

This year's launch was the first in several years that was open exclusively to canvassers and key volunteers.

"Certainly the financial efficiency and cost was a factor," said federation spokesperson Howard English. But, he added, "the primary motivation was to inform and educate those on the front line of fundraising...in order for them to be as enthusiastic and excited as possible about raising the funds."

UJA Campaign 2010 Chairs Ken Tanenbaum and Debbie Kimel with keynote speaker Brian Burke, centre, president and general manager of the Toronto Maple Leafs.

A public event will be held later in the campaign, he said.

Cost savings from the launch were "significant," but impossible to compare directly to last year because other events were included both years and were part of different budgets, he said.

Keynote speaker Brian Burke, vice-president and general manager of the Toronto Maple Leafs, said that when he puts a team together, he includes three components – excitement, running it like a business, and community service."

He focused on similarities between "the profit and non-profit side," and said he believes there's a right way and a wrong way to ask for money. He recommended research, and knowing which goals will resonate with decision makers.

The average professional sports team expects attrition in its revenue base of 15 to 35 per cent in hard times, Burke said, but noted that that is not the case with UJA.

Last year, UJA Federation raised $65 million for Jewish community needs in Toronto, Israel and internationally. Local beneficiaries include agencies like Jewish Family & Child, Parnossah Works Canada - a partner of JVS, Circle of Care, and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

As of last week, the 2010 campaign had raised more than $16 million from over 1,600 donors, said Tanenbaum, whose co-chair is Debbie Kimel.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul-general for Ontario and western Canada, said that what happens in Toronto with regard to Israel, has "huge significance" elsewhere.

"It puts a huge responsibility on us, because the eyes of the world, the eyes of the Jewish community, and the eyes of Israel are on us.

"What you do together as a team enables Israel... to achieve its goals in areas from PR to education, and from Eilat to Metulla. The world of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto touches the lives of millions, and this is no exaggeration."

The program also included guest speaker Arna Poupko Fisher, president of the Jewish Community Relations Council of the Jewish Federation of Cincinnati and faculty member of the University of Cincinnati's Jewish studies department.

As well, Alex Iscoe, 29, who was involved in creating a camp scholarship through UJA Federation in memory of his friend Jordan Propas, spoke of his experiences climbing the highest mountains on each of the seven continents (five to date) to raise money for UJA.

UJA's annual Super Sunday telethon will be held Sept. 13.

An Elder whose protocol would destroy Zion

At an emotional meeting last week in Berlin with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu offered his views on some of the conclusions that Jews must draw from the horrors of the Holocaust. "We must not allow those who want to commit mass murder, those who want to destroy the Jews, to emerge unscathed." Jews must be able to defend themselves, and barbarians must be prevented from acquiring arms, the prime minister added.

It was not a broad-ranging, philosophical statement by the Israeli prime minister but an eminently sensible one in light of the pervasive nature and sheer scope of the sadistic evil of that nightmarish period of time. Nevertheless, a continent away, at a press conference in Jerusalem the following day, South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu derided Netanyahu's observations.

Commenting to Ha'aretz on Netanyahu's statement, Archbishop Tutu offered that "in South Africa, they tried to get security from the barrel of a gun. They never got it. They got security when the human rights of all were recognized and respected."

Archbishop Tutu is a member of an organization called The Elders, a self-appointed group of hoary-headed men and women who consider themselves to be the sages of the world. They were in Israel to impart their latest wisdom regarding peace in the region.

The archbishop's comments on Netanyahu's statement were a reiteration of the same sanctimonious, supercilious, vile drivel regarding Israel that he has often spoken in the past. His constant comparison of the Palestinians' experience with the apartheid experience of the black majority of South Africa is so grotesquely inaccurate it cannot in any way be reconciled with the truth.

But the archbishop was not finished. He cleverly tied two loathsome themes into one choking knot of anti-Israel propaganda. "Who pays the penance [for the Holocaust]?" he slyly asked. "The penance is being paid by the Arabs, by the Palestinians," he triumphantly answered.

The nub of the Archbishop's Mideast theology is the following: Founded on the backs of the Mandate-era Arabs, Israel, akin to an apartheid state, is the cross the Palestinians now bear for sins they did not commit. It is false history and dangerous theology.

Amazingly, but not surprisingly, Archbishop Tutu demands blanket immunity when propagating his anti-Israel doctrines. For he also condemned Jewish organizations in the United States, who, he said intimidate anyone who criticizes the "occupation" and rush to accuse Israel's critics of anti-Semitism. Tutu has an odiously self-serving approach to his Elders' politics. His criticism of the Jewish state, he considers to be eminently helpful. Israel's defenders' criticism of him, on the other hand, he brands as intimidation.

If adopted, the protocol of this Elder would lead to the destruction of Zion. God forbid.

25 years ago in The CJN

Parties allied with Shimon Peres' Labor party and those allied with Yitzhak Shamir and Likud agreed to form a national unity government. The agreement stipulated that the premiership would rotate between the two men, with Peres being prime minister first.

Women's voices heard in prayer

The writer of "A chance to sing" (Letter to the Editor, July 30), who laments the silencing of religiously vocal female role models, would be interested to know that there is a female cantorial soloist who adds wonderful ruach to the tfillah at Temple Emanu-El Beth-Sholom in her hometown of Montreal.

In my own congregation in Kingston, Ont., I am fortunate occasionally to share the pulpit with a female cantorial soloist. Toronto is blessed with a plethora of both invested cantors and cantorial soloists, women who are members of the Toronto Council of Hazzanim. Last year, hundreds of people in Toronto enjoyed a wonderful evening of Jewish music at the Kol Isha concert, highlighting women cantors and cantorial soloists.

I am proud to count among my friends one of the first two women cantors in the Conservative movement, and to study in chevrutah with another friend, a woman who is a cantorial soloist at a local synagogue. I can think of dozens of women who lead services, sing in choirs, compose synagogue music, deliver divrei Torah, lein Torah or chant the Haftorah in shul.

Even in some very traditional settings, women lead Psukei dezimrah (the preliminary part of the Shacharit service) and chant Megillat Esther. Mothers and daughters study together for bat mitzvah. The female role models who are passionate and vocal about their Judaism, consisting of rabbis, cantors, educators, teachers and students, are out there and, frankly, they are not that difficult to find.

Importance of Yiddish in the media

We want to express our gratitude for your dedication to Yiddish culture, so predominant in our recent history. It's true that this is consistent with a current universal sweep in Yiddish. But without the voice of the media, general acceptance and interest might be more difficult to find.

In our estimation, your recent choice of Gerry Kane as the editor of your Yiddish Corner is excellent. He is knowledgeable and he will create renewed interest in Yiddish culture locally and nationally.

We need to raise our voices

Letter writer Eric Mendelsohn ("Need Left Wing Views in CJN", Aug. 20) suggests that The CJN publish one left-wing op-ed column every week. It seems to me that The CJN has already more than implemented this suggestion, and if anything is lacking in the left-leaning CJN, it's writing from right-wing perspectives. There are plenty of Jews with opinions outside the Jewish mainstream that The CJN is right to try to reflect. But there are appropriate limits to what a central Jewish community publication like The CJN should publish, for example from Jews who may be advocating for another religion, or from Jews who in their eagerness to ingratiate themselves with one or another group (whether right or left) take positions usually reserved for anti-Semites, like de-legitimizing Jewish or Israeli self-defence.

Says York U story a "whitewash"

I read the story headlined "Jewish Link to York U 'absolutely essential'" (July 30) with astonishment. It's a whitewash and a "feel-good" attempt to cover up a situation that is dangerously out of control. It is obvious that York University president Mamdouh Shoukri is in damage-control mode. I have been at the university on many occasions, trying to assess the validity of concerns that have been expressed to me by students and their parents. The only conclusion I can draw is that York has become full of anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment. The current administration is ultimately responsible for the negative atmosphere on campus. Safety and security should be of paramount concern. Shoukri and his administration need to be shaken up, if not fired. The members of the philanthropic Jewish community who have made significant contributions to York need to give their collective heads a shake.

The United Church conference: a first-hand account

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

There has been no shortage of reporting on last month's United Church convention (technically, General Council), much of it somewhat confusing – what happened, what resolutions passed, what resolutions were defeated, is it good for the Jews, for the United Church, etc.

In this article, I will make an effort to provide some measure of clarity. I was there, and since the convention was recent enough, I still remember the events as they unfolded pretty well.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), and I left for Kelowna, B.C., on Aug. 10, to be joined there by Michael Elterman, a British Columbia CJC stalwart. I was invited as a clergy resource person, as were clergy from other faiths. Bernie and Michael came on their own. As an invited guest, I had speaking privileges, but no voting privileges. Bernie and Michael had neither. But they were allowed to be present, and they interacted very effectively with United Church delegates.

The full sessions were held in the gym of the University of British Columbia in Kelowna. As an invited guest, I sat at a table with other delegates from the United Church. Bernie and Michael could attend, but had to sit in the grandstand, or bleachers. The view from those seats was quite satisfactory.

United Church conventions handle many issues. There are so many that the delegates are divided into commissions, with different commissions tasked with dealing with specific sets of resolutions. The Atlantic commission dealt with the Israel resolutions, and I was, thankfully, assigned to the Atlantic commission.

Each commission, although representing only one-third of the delegates, decides for the entire church. Otherwise, delegates could not tackle their considerable agenda. The cynic would say that if they dropped their anti-Israel items, they would have more time.

The four Israel-related resolutions came up for discussion at the afternoon session of the Atlantic commission on Aug. 11. Right at the outset, a resolution was proposed that repudiated and regretted the provocative, unbalanced and hurtful background material that was circulated to the delegates as the basis for the resolutions. There were four Israel-related resolutions, three of which recommended a boycott of Israel. It was in the background material to these resolutions that the most disgusting anti-Semitic accusations were made. These accusations included that taking MPs to visit Israel amounted to bribery (these MPs visit Palestinian leaders during those visits), and that some Jewish MPs had "dual" loyalties, which is code for being disloyal to Canada.

These are vicious allegations, and they aroused the anger not only of the Jewish community, but also many United Church leaders. The offensive material was brought to public attention by Canadian Jewish Congress, so that by the time the commission got to work at the convention, this matter had caused much anguish. The motion to repudiate and reject these slanders was passed almost unanimously.

Then it was on to the resolutions themselves. As an invited guest, I was given three minutes to address the commission from the podium, as were two others, both of whom urged that the commission approve the boycott resolutions. In my remarks, I told the delegates that the resolutions were born in hate. They had repudiated the hate, and they should likewise reject the product of that hate, the resolutions themselves. What is conceived in hate can amount to no good. I also told them that it's inconceivable that the Jewish community will continue any dialogue with the United Church should it decide to boycott Israel. To single out and vilify Israel would signal a breaking point in the relationship.

A resolution to refer all the resolutions to the General Council in some way or another was the subject of the ensuing debate. A motion to defer the decision meant that the matter was moved to the next session, set for Thursday morning, Aug. 13.

At the beginning of that session, a motion was placed on the floor to reject the three resolutions (Toronto 9, Toronto 10 and Toronto 13) calling for boycott. That resolution passed, but not unanimously, maybe by a two-to-one margin. This meant that the United Church rejected the boycott of Israel as an official policy of the church. This was the main purpose of our going to Kelowna.

We have no illusions. We know that the United Church of Canada is anything but united when it comes to Israel. There are some who are passionately supportive of Israel, who recognize that Israel is surrounded by implacable enemies bent on its destruction, enemies who place more importance on destroying Israel than on building bridges for peace and opportunity for themselves.

And there are some who just don't get it. They see the suffering and jump to the conclusion that this suffering is imposed by Israel, when it is in the main self-imposed suffering. I will give them all the benefit of their being sincere, though the hateful language in the background materials that was repudiated suggests something short of love for Israel.

The debate on the motion to accept the fourth resolution, called Montreal & Ottawa 7, which was essentially a strengthening of the United Church's already stated position on the Middle East, became quite complicated. I argued from the floor that the United Church should reject negative approaches, and concentrate only on encouraging and supporting positive, bridge-building initiatives. Many delegates shared that view, but many others did not.

So, wording that recommended directing the General Secretary, General Council and the conferences, presbyteries, congregations and community ministries to consult, dialogue and study, and take appropriate action toward ending the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and enter into conversation as to how to move the two peoples toward reconciliation (including but not limited to economic boycott) was placed before the commission.

There were so many amendments made that by the time it came to vote, delegates at my table, at least, didn't realize they were voting for the entire article of the motion. They thought they were just voting on an amendment. In my frustration at what was a rushed and unclear process, I ran up to the microphone and protested, saying in effect as follows: "Do you realize that you just voted for boycotting Israel? This will have grave repercussions."

This was due to the confusing array of amendments upon amendments that were in the resolution. It turned out that the resolution didn't embrace a boycott, but it also didn't reject it for the future. In effect, the United Church went back to where it had been. I will not hide my disappointment that the United Church failed to reject the idea of a boycott. At the same time, and without defending the church, a resolution to talk about a boycott is nothing more than a resolution to talk about a boycott. That freedom to contemplate was there before the convention and remains after the convention.

The bottom line is as follows: the United Church rejected an anti-Israel boycott as church policy and left open a wide range of initiatives for autonomous local churches. We achieved what we set out to achieve. This was not the place to enter into debate on some of the basic formulations and statements that comprise United Church policy on Israel. Had we done so, we would have achieved nothing.

Let me illustrate this with an example. Someone made an amendment to a motion that they delete the word "Jewish" from the policy statement of the United Church, which is clear in affirming that a just peace in the Middle East will require the "recognition by the emergent State of Palestine of Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state within safe and secure borders." That motion was rejected, as it would have interfered with a stated United Church position, and could not be changed.

Had we focussed on the objectionable parts of United Church policy, we would have gotten nowhere.

It's worth noting that although there has been no shortage of negatives hurled at the United Church, it needs to be stressed that the official Church position is clear in affirming the right of Israel to exist as a Jewish state within safe and secure borders, and that for peace to ensue, this must be affirmed by Israel's adversary. It would be unfair to ignore this and its significance.

Let me conclude with a few observations:

- Some of the most hateful literature disseminated at the United Church convention, and some of the most hurtful anti-Israel sentiments, came from groups claiming to speak for Jews.
- Israel has some very good friends in the United Church who voted against boycott, because they value and appreciate Israel.
- The church's connection to the Jewish community and working with the Jewish community is very important to a large percentage of United Church members.
- There is a significant and growing (specially among the younger generation) sentiment that is less than positive toward Israel.
- The boycott issue won't go away on its own. The approved resolution calls for "continuing guidance" on this matter, and also calls for a report on it to the 41st General Council in three years.
- The Jewish community is blessed with dedicated public servants who have worked diligently and productively with the United Church over the years. It's thanks to them that a boycott was rejected – people such as Victor Goldbloom, Rabbi Howard Joseph, Marsha Levy, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, and Eric Vernon have devoted a lifetime of work to this. This is all Canadian Jewish Congress work. And the work to build a better understanding in a church that allows for the free expression of all views is a daunting task. We all need to applaud the work of CJC, and to support its efforts with the United Church and other groups that don't appreciate Israel in its true greatness.

Opinions

An open letter to Obama

Dear President Obama,

You've been putting a lot of pressure on Israel lately. You want peace in the Middle East. So do we all. But the question, as always, is how do we get there? The answer eludes us. But I wonder if I could be so bold as to suggest that first you must try to understand Israel.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Recently, you sent former U.S. president Bill Clinton to North Korea to secure the release of two American citizens. They were kidnapped and held for five months. Clinton had to sit with his former enemy, Kim Jong Il, to negotiate their release. It wasn't an easy thing for him to do in public. But the ends were worthy. The joy of the two women brought to freedom, the elation of their families, the public jubilation and the redemption of American sovereignty – all played out on television – were a priceless goal and a tailor-made public relations score for your administration.

Now I know that there was more than meets the eye in this event. The two photographers may or may not have been innocent. The North Koreans were playing politics while issues of nuclear armaments were involved. Discussions of serious international issues were held. All this took place behind the subterfuge of the release of two captured Americans. We also know that President Clinton would never have travelled to North Korea without definite assurances that he would be successful in gaining their release. The public spectacle was to be successful – that was important for you and for America.

Now look to Israel – to one example, though regrettably, I could choose many. Gilad Schalit was kidnaped three years ago. For three years, his family has yearned for him and kept his story on the front pages. His country has looked and negotiated and pleaded. But those you would have Israel sit down with have remained silent. No news. No humanitarian response. No visits.

Is he alive or hurt? Imagine not being able to move the North Koreans to any confirmation of the state of the two women. How would America react? How would your presidency fare? Can you understand or empathize? A son gone missing and not a word. We cannot even begin to know what Gilad is like or feels or knows. Or even if he is alive. This is driving us mad. And yet you pressure us. Pressure them.

Understand this.

Bring back Gilad with the other kidnapped victims and then let the talks begin.

Are we wasting our time with the United Church?

Recent events surrounding the United Church General Assembly in Kelowna, B.C., should come as no surprise to anyone who has followed the stance of the United Church regarding the State of Israel and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In fact, we may ask ourselves just how much real headway we make in discussions with that denomination.

In 1983, I was charged with working with representatives of churches at the World Council of Churches' (WCC) world conference in Vancouver. My task, along with national Canadian Jewish Congress representatives, was to co-ordinate multifarth dialogues.

Prior to the WCC meeting, a group of us were flown to Mauritius for a pre-conference conference. The island is a fascinating experience in its own right, home to at least four very different peoples: Tamil, Chinese, Creole and French. We visited Hindu and Chinese temples and viewed a parade of penitents with their cheeks, tongues and bodies pierced with silver blades and carrying huge shrines. We were also treated to outbursts by the Palestinian representative, a Quaker named Jean Zaru, and it was there that I saw the bond that had been created between the United Church and the Palestinian cause.

No need to repeat here the litany of small one-on-one encounters at the Vancouver meeting, which were interesting, or the overwhelming hostility to Israel on all sides.

I realize that much weightier people than I work very hard to maintain communication with the United Church, locally as well as nationally, and even internationally. I would also argue that these links are tenuous at best. We are swimming upstream against a powerful tide of empathy for the downtrodden within the church, an empathy that will not extend to Israeli citizens who are targets of Hamas rockets or terrorist bombs.

I do indeed appreciate the work that spokespeople such as Rabbi Reuven Bulka and other CJC representatives, along with many local community figures, do in trying to engage with the United Church and other denominations in a discussion about Israel. I also believe that these talks may in the long run be largely futile, given the overall United Church attitude toward social justice issues.

They talk about being "called to witness" and dialogue with the "elder brother" – that's us – but the members charged with developing positions have shown themselves to be just as entranced by the Palestinian issue as are others who are even more unfriendly to Jews and Judaism, never mind Israel.

Hence their not-so-subtle accusations of dual loyalty for Canadian Jews, and their charges that Israel engages in ethnic cleansing, or that we control media and politicians. They truly believe that Israel has perpetrated all manner of atrocities, and they close their eyes to Palestinian attacks, or justify them as liberation attempts.

A few years ago, while researching attitudes of United Church and Anglican leadership for this column, I wrote to the Canadian leaders of both denominations. The Anglican head replied that "we would have to agree to disagree" about Israel. From the United Church moderator, I heard not a word.

This reflects a fascination with Third World victims of colonialism – Israel being what the church considers to be the colonial western power in the Middle East – and an increasing willingness to believe the worst not just of Israel, but of Canadian Jews as well.

The weaker that denomination becomes as it loses membership, the more strident its tone will become. That the groups charged with developing those resolutions are largely young church members – and not "fringe members" as Rabbi Bulka has been quoted as saying in this paper – speaks to their commitment to continue their attacks on Israel (which isn't helped by Israel's own often inept and sometimes harmful policies). After all, the denomination is desperately in need of young members if it's to survive and thrive.

After the 1983 meeting, I was asked to attend a United Church retreat in Naramata B.C. My family spent a weekend with a local congregation discussing our two belief systems and the words that seemed to be common to both faiths, such as atonement, charity and redemption. It was a wonderful experience.

I can't imagine it happening again.

Connecting with Jewish communities abroad

On occasion, I have written about the visits to various Jewish institutions that my wife, Karen, and I have encountered during our travels. Wherever we travel, we appreciate the common experiences of Jewish culture, ritual and worship in a variety of environments.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Two years ago, I wrote about our visit to the only synagogue in Canada between Calgary and the Pacific coast, located in Kelowna, B.C., and its successful, attached Okanagan Jewish Community Centre.

Recently, I described my visit to Buenos Aires, Argentina, where we attended beautiful synagogues and experienced the large, dynamic Jewish community of that city. Evidence of the vibrant Jewish community included an active Jewish community centre, kosher restaurants and other shops owned by Jewish proprietors, including a kosher McDonald's in a major downtown shopping mall.

This summer, we visited San Francisco, where we also enjoyed a Shabbat service at the beautiful Congregation Emanu-El. We also spent many hours touring the exhibits at the Contemporary Jewish Museum, which is housed in an architecturally striking building tucked away in a courtyard behind the downtown Marriott Hotel.

Of course, no Jewish experience compares to a visit to the State of Israel, where one is immersed in the richness of the life and history of the Jewish people.

However, the reality of anti-Semitism presents a sombre side to the contemporary global Jewish experience.

Last year on a trip to Poland, we toured Auschwitz, a place that carries the unimaginable memories of the Holocaust. In the Jewish Quarter of Krakow, we saw the remnants of that horribly decimated Polish Jewish community, and elsewhere in that city, we saw freshly painted anti-Semitic graffiti.

Our visit to Buenos Aires was marred by the unfortunate violent anti-Semitic and anti-Israel attack on community members and visiting dignitaries during the public celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut in front of Buenos Aires City Hall. The Jewish community in Argentina has been understandably careful since the tragic attack 15 years ago on the AMIA Jewish community centre that killed 85 people and injured hundreds. Years later, Interpol issued a warrant for the Iranian perpetrators of the attack. And just last month, the Argentine government justifiably expressed anger that one of those terrorists, Ahmad Vahidi, was recently appointed to the Iranian cabinet by Iran's anti-Semitic president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Jewish institutions around the world are necessarily security-conscious. In San Francisco, we had to pass through metal detectors at both the Contemporary Jewish Museum and the synagogue we visited. At the synagogues in Buenos Aires, vehicles aren't allowed to stop in front of the buildings, and visitors must call in advance and present identification before attending services.

Even in our "safe" Canadian cities, synagogues hire police officers to provide extra security during the High Holidays. We don't see similar measures being taken during, for example, the celebration of Christmas or Easter at most churches.

Closer to home, we know that the Canadian Parliamentary Committee to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA), a committee of the present Parliament of Canada, is studying the problem of anti-Semitism. We know that there's a significant amount of hate and Holocaust denial being widely disseminated in print and on the Internet. We know of the prosecutions under our Criminal Code for the propagation of hatred toward Jews and other similar proceedings under federal and provincial anti-discrimination laws. We acknowledge that most of the anti-Israel attacks, including so-called "Israeli Apartheid Week" events, particularly in Toronto and Montreal, and calls for academic and scientific boycotts, are manifestations of the not-so-hidden "new anti-Semitism."

Despite the undercurrent of anti-Jewish sentiment and the need to be mindful of security concerns, visiting Jewish communities abroad is enriching. To be sure, it's a heartwarming and enlightening experience to visit Jewish institutions around the world and, in spite of the great distances involved, to solidify connections among our diverse communities. In doing so, one is left with a strong sense of our community's historical place, present dynamism and promise of future growth and vibrancy.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Krakow

When Hollywood film director Steven Spielberg decided to turn Thomas Keneally's novel, Schindler's Ark, into a movie, he knew that it had to be shot in the southern Polish city of Krakow, where German industrialist Oskar Schindler had saved hundreds of Jews by employing them in his pot and pan factory in the Podgorze district, just south of the Vistula River.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

Yet when he visited Podgorze, the site of a Nazi ghetto from 1941 onward, he discovered that it had been so developed that it had lost its prewar authenticity.

So he looked at Kazimierz, a dilapidated, forlorn neighbourhood north of Podgorze that had been a mainly Jewish enclave prior to World War II.

He was hooked. With its maze of cobblestone streets and historic buildings, including an unsurpassed collection of synagogues, Spielberg found the colour and the atmosphere he needed. And so Schindler's List was filmed in Kazimierz.

Thanks to his foresight, as well as a growing interest among Poles in Jewish culture since the end of the Communist era in 1989, Kazimierz has evolved into a mecca for domestic and foreign tourists.

Its utter transformation surprises even longtime residents of Krakow, one of Poland's loveliest cities. As Tadeusz Jakubowcicz, the leader of Krakow's tiny Jewish community, put it, "Kazimierz was desolate, the dirtiest, most neglected place in Krakow."

But since its startling metamorphosis, Kazimierz – the venue of a successful annual Jewish cultural festival – has become such a draw that some observers have have disparagingly likened it to Disneyland.

"Kazimierz is over-commercialized, too kitschy," said Katarzyna Zimmerer, a local historian. "But it was unavoidable. Kazimierz is so fashionable."

Bristling with cafés and restaurants serving non-kosher Jewish-style meals, kiosks dispensing an assortment of Judaica, shops selling books on Jewish topics and boutique hotels catering to tourists from near and afar, Kazimierz is something of a manufactured still-life of a vanished universe that the Nazis ruthlessly obliterated during the Holocaust.

That some Polish Catholics are inexorably drawn to Kazimierz is hardly surprising, observed Ewa Czuchaj, a middle-aged guide who was born in Novy Sacz, a town 100 kilometres from Krakow whose population was once half Jewish. "Polish people want to know more about Jewish history and culture. It's not a a taboo subject anymore."

Kazimierz, whose identity was formed largely by Jews, but which was separated by a wall from the Christian quarter until 1820, is nothing if not quaint.

Szeroka Street, which resembles an elongated square, is its heart and soul. The synagogues and the historic Jewish cemetery for which Kazimierz is famous are found mainly here and on Jozefa Street.

The Old Synagogue, now a museum, is said to be Poland's longest-surviving shul, a 15th-century structure that has been repeatedly remodelled. The Remuh Synagogue, founded by the Isserles family shortly afterward, adjoins a cemetery that was in use from the 1500s to the 1800s. The Popper Synagogue is a cultural centre today, as are Kupa Synagogue and the Izaak Synagogue. The High Synagogue is used for cultural exhibitions, while the Tempel Synagogue, the only Reform shul in Kazimierz, has been a venue of Krakow's Jewish Cultural Festival.

Helena Rubinstein, the founder of a cosmetics empire, was born in Kazimierz. The house in which she was raised is boarded up and decrepit in appearance.

The Hotel Ester is practically next door. Its glossy brochure proclaims in several languages, including Hebrew and German, that it is set "amidst a scenery that brings back the lost world of the Chassidism…."

Steps away is Klezmer Hois, a hotel whose restaurant features such Jewish delicacies as Purim chicken, Litvak herring and matzah ball soup and which offers the foot-stomping music of Leopold Kozlowski, the last prewar klezmer musician left in Poland.

Around the corner is the Arka Noego (Noah's Ark), a restaurant whose walls are festooned with charcoal drawings of rabbis and vintage photographs of traditional Polish Jews. On its menu is Jewish-style carp, poultry cholent, Galician salad, tzimmes and Beautiful Rachel's fish soup. The Saints, a klezmer band consisting of four Polish musicians, provides the entertainment.

Despite the profusion of restaurants and cafés dedicated to serving up old-fashioned Jewish cuisine, there is only one place in Kazimierz where kosher food is available, the Eden Hotel.

Behind the Hotel Ester is the Galicia Jewish Museum, founded by British photographer Chris Schwarz in 2004 to celebrate Galicia's Jewish past and to challenge the stereotypes and misconceptions associated with it.

The paintings of Polish-born Toronto painter Mayer Kirshenblatt were on display until recently. The Polish Jews he portrays may as well have lived in Kazimierz before the war, when the majority of its 15,000 Jewish residents were Orthodox Jews. The 47,000 secular Jews of Krakow tended to live outside Kazimierz.

Germany's conquest of Poland changed everything.

Krakow was occupied on Sept. 6, 1939, and by the summer of 1940, 35,000 Jews had been expelled from the city. Less than a year later, many of them were forced into the Podgorze ghetto. Podgorze's Catholic inhabitants were resettled in Kazimierz.

The Nazis began to deport Jews to the Belzec extermination camp in June 1942. On a cobblestone square, empty chairs fastened to iron pedestals symbolically signify these deportations.

Plans are afoot to convert Schindler's barrack-like workshops on Lipowa Street into an art exhibition hall in 2011. An adjoining building, part of Krakow's Historical Museum, has already mounted a permanent exhibition on Germany's occupation.

The Krakow ghetto was liquidated on March 13, 1943 by Amon Goth, a cruel and sadistic SS commander. With its liquidation, Krakow's remaining 8,000 Jews were sent to the Plaszow concentration camp, which had an an extremely high death rate. A fragment of the original ghetto wall, some 30 metres in length, stands on Lwowska Street.

Tadeusz Jakubowicz, the leader of Krakow's Jewish community

With the Red Army advancing on Krakow, the Nazis hastily dismantled Plaszow in 1945. Plaszow is now a sparsely wooded field in a semi-industrial area. A stylized monument on the ridge of a hill that pays tribute to its victims overlooks a highway and a shopping mall. Goth's weathered grey villa, crowned by a mansard roof, is still on Heltnana Street.

Goth's reign of terror almost touched Tadeusz Jakubowicz, a 70-year-old pianist who has led Krakow's Jewish community since 1999. He and his parents avoided Goth by fleeing into a forest and finding refuge in the barns of Polish farmers.

Shortly after they returned to Krakow, following Germany's defeat, the city was convulsed by a pogrom near the Kupa Synagogue in which two Jews were killed. Shaken by the incident, many Jews departed. Jakubowicz's father, Maciej, who came from same town as Karol Wojtyla, Poland's future pope, stayed in Poland.

Today, Krakow is home to some 200 Jews, while about another 1,000 remain unaffiliated. The average age of its registered members ranges from 65 to 70. Jakubowicz, whose wife is a Catholic but whose daughter has been brought up Jewish, believes that conversions will help the community grow. But the glory days of Krakow's Jewish community have definitely passed. As he said, "The Krakow of old is gone for good."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Saturday opening keeps with Y's mission

By MICHAEL CRELINSTEIN

Guest Voice

The article in The CJN on Aug. 20 regarding the decision of the YM-YWHA Montreal Jewish Community Centre to open its facility on Saturday afternoons requires some clarification and context.

Characterizing Federation CJA as having "chided" the Y regarding its consultative process is misleading. The leadership of the two organizations naturally and appropriately spoke with each other about the Y's intention to open on Saturday after 1 p.m. Among other things, we discussed the Y's consultative approach to the decision. Federation would have preferred a broader consultation. The Y explained its rationale for the process we were following. The discussion was civil and mutually respectful.

The Y's decision did not "come out of the blue," without any process. It was the result of months of internal debate as well as informal discussion with, and feedback from, community and Y members. It was discussed and reviewed in detail at meetings of the Y's executive, board of directors and board of trustees. At all three venues, the vote in support was overwhelmingly in favour. That the process was not the same as in the 2003 study on Shabbat policy does not equate to there having been no process.

With regard to the 2003 study, a careful review of the data does not show "overwhelming opposition" to the possibility of Saturday opening. In fact, the respondents were split down the middle at the time. The collective wisdom of the organization, at that time, was, nevertheless, to avoid the divisiveness that they believed would ensue from a change in policy.

It's the view of the Y's leadership, supported by community and membership feedback, as well as demographic data, that our community has changed, is changing and continues to change, rapidly. Our decision to accommodate that change is mission-based, and our mission is to serve the broadest spectrum possible of our community.

The perception that this is an "exercise in sacrificing principles for the bottom line" is inaccurate. We have consulted extensively with other JCCs around North America. The common experience is that the decision to open on Saturday incurs increased costs and is revenue neutral at best. Every JCC we spoke with reported that they, nevertheless, went forward with the decision based upon a mission-based responsibility to best serve the entire community.

The CJN article asks what we are doing to reach out to the unaffiliated, working people and young families. In fact, our Saturday opening decision is part of a larger strategy to reach out to children, youth and families. This includes programs such as BBYO, the Diller Jewish youth leadership program, the Koby Mandell Centre for Jewish Learning at the Country Camp, involvement with the March of the Living, an extensive community outreach partnership with federation in the West Island, a major renovation of our fitness facility at our Ben Weider branch, a series of programs celebrating the Y's history in the Montreal Jewish community during our 100th anniversary year in 2010, and more. As discussed at meetings between the Y and rabbinical leadership, we hope to work with rabbis to offer other activities, in addition to our two Shabbat services, on Saturday afternoons. We have no intention of "competing with synagogues." Our desire is to collaborate with them to provide every member of our community with a way to connect as individuals and families.

For almost 100 years, the Montreal JCC has adapted and responded to change to serve our community and to be as inclusive as possible. This is our mission. This is our mandate.

Students must defend Israel on campus

By RANDY PINSKY

Guest Voice

As the new school year approaches, students experience the annual "nervous stomach syndrome" of anticipation mixed with anxiety, topped by ambivalence.

As a Jewish university student, my stomach is no different, but my back-to-school jitters are spiced with a special concern: what sort of atmosphere will we be greeted with on campus this year? Reflecting on the instability of 2009, I'm warily viewing the upcoming semester and wondering how I can somehow be better prepared.

I was, therefore, thrilled to hear that the Montreal-based Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) was co-ordinating a conference titled "Israel on Campus: Defending Our Universities" on Aug. 23. I anticipated meeting similarly committed students who had had enough of passively accepting unfounded accusations and weeks devoted to demonizing Israel, and wished to empower themselves.

Upon my arrival, I was disappointed to see the paucity of youth in the audience. Was it student apathy, insufficient advertising or merely time conflicts that caused this absence? Despite my misgivings, the morning panel masterfully contextualized the current dire situation. It discussed the unacceptable campus environment, focusing on accusations made by "promoters of human rights" who unfairly single out Israel while obscuring the crimes of despotic countries; cases of harassment; abuses of academic integrity for propagandistic aims, and harmful comments disguised as "freedom of speech." The discussion infused the audience with activist zeal and shook them out of their customary "shush-stance."

Newly enthused, we eagerly awaited the afternoon to hear strategies to counter the current hostile atmosphere.

But I was dismayed to find that I would leave the conference with more questions than reassuring answers on how to respond on campus.

According to the panelists, university students must choose between two polar-opposite options. We can engage in radical activism – "naming and shaming" and exposing professors who advocate radicalized assertions, and publicly condemning universities. But this is unrealistic, as many students legitimately fear identifying themselves on campus. I'm concerned that such responses would be seen as instigation and only result in increased hostility. The brief sense of empowerment following such actions fails to adequately balance their possible repercussions.

The other option, I was surprised to hear, was to merely accept our roles as students and ignore the "political theatre" erupting on campus. Similar to an attention-getting sibling, we were assured, campus activists will eventually lose interest in Israel. This "advice" was an unfortunate display of ignorance about the true situation on campuses, as Israeli Apartheid Week hasn't waned, but rather is growing in international momentum. The situation is exacerbated by greater numbers of faculty members adding academic legitimacy to unfounded assertions by extremist students.

These options left me confused and frustrated at the lack of tangible advice for how to best deal with future encounters of this sort. While the CIJR is proactive in offering a student Israel advocacy program, conference attendees could have benefited from the skills that will be imparted there. Although the organization undertook a critical step in co-ordinating this conference, I feel, sadly, that we're still under-equipped.

As a student, I want to know where I can assert my rights, as well as how to counter unfounded statements and, most importantly, how to meet similarly minded individuals. We must correct misconceptions, defend Israel when in rational company and, overall, cease our passive acceptance of what's going on.

In order to establish change on campus, we, as students, must be vigilant, informed and involved. Israel has enough on its plate fighting its own battles. As students, we must do our part and remedy the hostile atmosphere before it deteriorates any further.

Climbing as far we can for tshuvah

By RABBI MEIR ROSENBERG

Summer is when we look forward to relief from our daily routine with a few days or weeks of well-deserved rest and relaxation.

It's hard to imagine that as we usher in the month of Elul, there are only 30 days to Rosh Hashanah and 40 days to Yom Kippur. How do we inspire ourselves toward change and spiritual renewal while we are trying to vacation? Sometimes the best inspiration comes from our local environment, and sometimes a new beginning requires a fresh look at that environment.

I recently revisited downtown Toronto after attending a Blue Jays game, and I was amazed at the ever-expanding skyline of new office buildings and condominiums in an area where there is little space to build, except upward. The most striking feature of downtown is the CN Tower, one of the world's tallest freestanding structures.

The tower boasts the world's longest metal staircase. While reading this fact at its base, I began to think about what it would be like to climb it all in a single day. "Surely that's impossible," I thought. But as I looked further, I saw various posters for charity groups who had sponsored stair climbs up the tower. Sponsors donated money based upon how many flights climbers reached.

The tower and the charities reminded me of a parable related by my teacher, Rabbi Berel Wein, concerning repentance and proximity to HaShem, our goals in preparation for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

There once lived a king who built many grand structures in his capital city. The grandest of all was a soaring tower with a staircase 1,000 storeys high.

In honour of the opening of this magnificent structure, the king offered half his kingdom to anyone who could climb all 1,000 storeys in a single day.

Throughout the kingdom, people prepared to meet the challenge. They exercised to build up strength and stamina. When the tower opened, hopeful contestants began their trudge. Some reached only three or four flights before abandoning their effort. Others reached 30 and even 35 storeys. But all of them gave up, convinced that even if they could climb another five, 10 or 100 stories, they could never reach the top in a day.

One man was an exception. He wasn't stronger than the others, nor was he faster. But instead of abandoning the climb, he abandoned his doubts about reaching the top. "Let me just see how far I can possibly go," he decided.

He easily ascended the first few flights, then struggled to climb higher. "I'll just keep climbing as long as I have a little more strength," he thought.

By the 25th floor, his muscles ached and his shirt was soaked with sweat. He rested a few minutes, then resumed. By the 30th floor, he was clinging to the banister, hoisting each leaden leg solely through the power of his will. At the 35th floor, he was coming to the end of his endurance. Yet somehow he drove himself to continue, summoning reserves of strength he never knew he had.

Finally, at the 40th floor, his legs would climb no more. Although his will urged him on, his body was utterly spent.

He stumbled to the stairwell door and with a last bit of strength, he pushed it open. Before his eyes was an elevator lobby, gleaming and silent. Above the elevator hung a sign that read, "Express elevator to the 1,000th floor."

That's the essence of tshuvah, repentance. At some point, our most ardent efforts become exhausted, but HaShem is waiting. It's impossible to climb 1,000 flights of stairs in a single day. It's also impossible to reach the peak of Torah and mitzvah observance, even if we spend a lifetime trying. Our job is to keep going, knowing that when we have gone as far as our strength can carry us, whether we have reached the fifth floor or the 50th, God will carry us the rest of the way.

I believe the same can be said of personal and national growth – if we move upward and forward one step at a time, God will grant us the strength and stamina to reach many lofty and worthy goals in our individual lives and a lasting and secure peace in Eretz Yisrael for the people of Israel.

The appeal of a teacher

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman C4

Issues of church and state, especially in the United States with its constitutional separation of these two realms, are always controversial, often fascinating and at times trailblazing.

As briefly reported in this newspaper (Aug. 20), a fascinating case is set to be heard by the New York State Appellate Court. At issue is the degree, if any, to which the secular courts may intervene in rulings of a beit din (religious court). The impetus for what could well be a precedent-setting case affecting all rulings – and in fact the functioning – of batei din throughout the United States is the ruling by a New York state lower court overturning a decision of the Beit Din of America (in my mind the pre-eminent rabbinical court in North America) in the case of Brisman vs HAFTR.

In that case, a teacher who was let go over "philosophical differences" and his ex-employer signed a binding arbitration agreement to have their case of "wrongful dismissal" heard by the Beit Din of America. The beit din ruled in favour of the rabbi and ordered the school to reinstate him with back pay (and tenure). To their credit the school, though unhappy with the ruling, did reinstate him and did not contest the ruling in the courts.

Interestingly, it was the teacher himself who sought to have the arbitration award confirmed by the court – a move that his lawyer explained was due to the fact that "under New York law, if an arbitration award is not confirmed within a year, it loses its validity." Therefore, if the school later chose to ignore the ruling of the beit din, there would have been no method of enforceability. The court, in overturning the decision of the beit din, labelled it irrational and said that it "clearly exceeds the arbitrators' power and is violative of public policy… [and] is counterproductive to a harmonious and productive work environment."

It hardly needs to be stated that the implications of this case are far-reaching, and it's not surprising that the Orthodox Union, Agudat Israel of America and Torah Umesora have joined together to file a brief to the court. As they make clear, they're not taking sides in the underlying dispute, but rather are seeking to ensure the independent authority and validity of rulings of the beit din system.

In reading about this case, a number of thoughts come to mind. The case itself presents us with two conflicting, perhaps irreconcilable values. A school must have the right to make personnel decisions. This is especially so when one considers that while our secular public schools strive to be value neutral (whatever that means), for Jewish schools, underlying values are at the core of their mission. One can't gloss over "philosophical differences." Yet to fire someone who has done no wrong and whose philosophical outlook was apparently known when he was hired seems unfair and harsh.

Schools today, unlike even 15 years ago, have the luxury of being able to hire teachers who reflect their philosophical outlook, leaving the difficult question of what to do with those who were hired at a time when it was often impossible to find teachers who reflected the ideological outlook of the school.

The case highlights the sad fact that our communal infrastructure hasn't matured to the point where we have a fully functioning beit din system, including an appeals mechanism that is recognized and accepted by all. Only by having the best of our legal minds and moral integrity involved in the often difficult and uncomfortable work of settling disputes will the situation begin to change, demonstrating the relevance of Jewish law to the real world in which we live.

Baseball fundraiser more than triples its take

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Some 500 members of the Jewish community came out to Brampton's Powerade Centre for a day of baseball, free barbecue and games at the second annual Pitch For Israel softball tournament fundraiser on Aug. 23.

It was all for a worthy cause: sending underprivileged Jewish kids to summer camp in Toronto and Eilat.

Daniel Warner, Pitch For Israel's founder and main organizer, is no stranger to either baseball or summer camp. Warner plays twice a week in B'nai Brith Canada's softball league, and his teammates are all friends he attended camp with over the years, both as a camper and as a counsellor.

"To be able to bring out over 500 people for one day to support the cause, which is to send underprivileged children to summer camp so they can get more involved in the Jewish community and get a more wholesome Jewish experience, is really important," he said.

"To be able to give other kids that opportunity means a lot to me, and I know it means a lot to all the other players who have been very fortunate in terms of going to overnight camp or day camp as they were growing up."

Last year, Pitch For Israel managed to bring in $30,000. This year, the goal was to double that, but the fundraisers – many of them members of participating teams – managed to more than triple last year's target goal, raising more than $100,000. All proceeds go to the UJA campaign, which funds the camps.

The number of sponsors also increased this year, from 10 to 40, including Birthright Israel, Jewish Urban Meeting Place, Yaldeinu, the Toronto Blue Jays, Lazar Gourmet Foods, Campus Marketing Agency, Hart Entertainment, Steelback Brewery, Mr. Produce and Red Bull.

The success of last year's event certainly helped in securing sponsors, but Warner said it also has much to do with how the sponsors feel about the Jewish community.

"They think it's a worthwhile cause, and they enjoy supporting Jewish community events. They saw an opportunity to support the next generation of Jewish leaders and their friends."

Warner, 26, has a BA in business management from the University of Western Ontario and has completed the first year of an MBA at York University. He also works full-time on his own company, Campus Marketing Agency, as well as the website campusintel.com, which he describes as "an online student resource for Canadian students."

To ease some of the pressure, Warner had plenty of help from friends and family in organizing Pitch For Israel, including his parents, sister and girlfriend, as well as fellow co-ordinators Justine Grossman and Rachel Bielak.

"It was really a team effort," he said. "They've been a great source of encouragement and support the whole way through, and they try to keep me sane between full-time work organizing this event and doing my MBA."

The number of teams nearly doubled in size from last year, from 12 to 20, and this year's tourney featured both male and female divisions.

Warner attributed the growth to the success of last year's event.

"A lot of the teams came back from last year because they said they had such a great time... they raised a great deal of money, and they really got behind the tournament and were really excited to be a part of it," he said.

Due to the tremendous growth of the event, Warner had to move it from Camp Robin Hood in Markham to the Powerade Centre, a much larger facility with five diamonds, as opposed to Robin Hood's three.

"Everyone seems to like the location," he says. "It's convenient, it's clean, the fields are large. The Powerade Centre has been a great host. They've really been able to take care of us."

As an avid ball player, Warner smiled when asked about the level of competition at the tournament.

"It does get competitive, but everyone's friends here," he said. "It's an awesome way to spend a Sunday."

This may be just the beginning for Pitch For Israel. In fact, Warner has already received offers from several U.S. organizations to expand the tournament south of the border.

"It's definitely interesting to be able to widen our reach and be able to help as many people as possible within our community," he said.

"My focus is to get more people involved, get more community partners involved, get more sponsors involved. Maybe do a two-day tournament next year. We'll see what happens."

'I think parents understand our system offers huge value'

He called it "remarkable" that more than 11,000 students are currently enrolled in Jewish day schools in the Toronto area. "I think parents understand our system offers huge value."

TanenbaumCHAT receives more than 400 new students a year, Shaviv said. However, the numbers have dropped slightly for this year, in part due to demographics, "but our retention has been very good," he added.

"We've managed to keep our [tuition] increase under four per cent, at 3.8 per cent... [through] very careful and prudent budgeting."

Shaviv speculated that "if the economics of private school education continue to be a problem, we may find parents will choose a four-year program of high school preceded by [public] elementary school." However, he added, that "has been said for several years."

TanenbaumCHAT's "new stream" program, for students who have not previously attended Jewish day school, currently serves about 12 per cent of the school's students.

Referring to Jewish education in general, Shaviv told The CJN that he believes there is no substitute for "a high-quality day school."

However, he added, "we may still see a resurgence of the supplementary school, as a result of economic circumstances."

Eric Petersiel, head of school of Leo Baeck Day School, told The CJN earlier this summer that all Jewish day schools in Toronto face the challenge of "how the economic environment causes people to question the value they place on day school education."

"We haven't lost students, but we certainly have a handful who are finding the decision much more difficult."

Associated Hebrew Schools – which has 550 students who receive tuition subsidies, the largest number in Toronto – will likely have 30 to 50 fewer students this year out of a total of 1,700, Arthur Landa, the school's executive director, told The CJN last week.

Eric Petersiel

"Whether its attributed to the economy, or to other factors, is very hard to correlate," he added.

He said there has not been a noticeable increase in tuition subsidy applications.

Day school tuitions in Ontario would be halved if the provincial government would pay the cost per capita for the secular studies part of the program, Landa said.

Generally speaking, he said, 80 per cent of the budget of schools goes toward educational services, including teachers' salaries and educational supplies, while the other 20 per cent is divided more or less equally between administrative costs and the cost of maintenance and operations.

Tuition fees rise at most day schools

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

With inflation in Canada running at a 56-year low of less than one per cent, parents at Toronto's major Jewish day schools are facing tuition fee increases this fall of up to seven per cent for elementary grades.

Tuition at Leo Baeck Day School for this year is up seven per cent over last year, at $11,550 for full-day junior kindergarten to Grade 8, and $5,775 for half-day nursery and junior kindergarten.

Head of school Eric Petersiel said that "the seven per cent increase unfortunately [is] almost entirely spent to cover the significant increase in existing families who now qualify for financial assistance according to UJA Federation [of Greater Toronto] guidelines," because federation only funds part of tuition subsidies, with tuition fees covering the rest.

Petersiel added that the fee increases will also cover "some extra funding for staff professional development, as we apply for International Baccalaureate authorization this year."

At the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, the city's largest Jewish high school, tuition has increased by four per cent, from $18,200 to $18,900.

"The school went to great lengths to keep tuition fees to an absolute minimum [and] is very sensitive to the changing status of our economy," said director of education Paul Shaviv.

"The school will cut the budget for a deficit. We try to break even each year, which is why we keep tuition fees at a minimum."

All grades at Bialik Hebrew Day School, excluding half days, will see a three per cent fee increase this year, to $11,925, up from $11,625 last year.

Half-day nursery and junior kindergarten at Associated Hebrew Day Schools climbed from $5,250 to $5,550, while full days rose from $10,250 to $10,950, a six and seven per cent increase, respectively.

Full-day senior kindergarten saw a eight per cent increase from last year, $11,200 from $10,400, while half days are now $5,725, up from $5,325, also an increase of eight per cent.

For grades 1 through 6, tuition rose from $11,150 to $11,950, an increase of seven per cent.

Grades 7 and 8 cost $11,400 last year, but this year climbed to $12,200, a seven per cent increase.

At Netivot HaTorah Day School, fees have remained the same as last year from nursery to senior kindergarten. Nursery is $3,125, while the extended nursery program remains at $5,633, full-day nursery is $8,140, half-day junior kindergarten remains is $5,570 and half-day senior kindergarten costs $5,710.

Grades 1 through 6 saw a two per cent increase, from $11,950 to $12,190, while grades 7 and 8 also increased two per cent, from $12,150 to $12,390.

At United Synagogue Day School, half-day junior and senior kindergarten costs $6,000 this year, up from $5,750, an increase of four per cent, while tuition for full-day senior kindergarten increased three per cent, from $11,500 to $11,900. (Tuition for USDS' full-day junior kindergarten, which launches this year, is the same as senior kindergarten.)

Costs for Grade 1 increased five per cent from last year, to $12,750 from $12,150 the previous year. Grades 2 to 5 increased by four per cent, from $12,400 to $12,900, while grades 6 to 8 increased five per cent, to $13,100 from $12,500.

At the Toronto Heschel School, fees have been frozen for the coming school year. Half-day junior kindergarten costs $5,800, while full-day is $10,800. Kindergarten is $13,900, while grades 1 to 3 cost $14,600, grades 4 to 5 cost $14,800 and grades 6 to 8 cost $15,100.

Calls to Eitz Chaim Day Schools weren't returned by The CJN's deadline.

Tuition at the Bnei Akiva high schools, Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot, rose from $18,000 to $18,750, an increase of four per cent.

"We always watch our budget and we always watch what we spend," said Jay Shiel, the schools' director of operations.

"We want to treat our teachers fairly while also balancing our budget. We always try to find the best cost for office supplies, and we try to be fair to our teachers, but we also try to be fair to parents as well."

Tuition fees for at least two non-Jewish private schools are substantially higher than at their Jewish counterparts.

The cost for Branksome Hall girls school this year, from junior kindergarten to Grade 10, is $24,530, compared to $23,610, a four per cent increase over last year. Grades 11 and 12 cost $26,530 this year, versus $25,310 the year before, a five per cent increase. There's also an initial registration fee of $5,000 for new students ($3,000 if a sister is already enrolled at Branksome, or will be enrolled by next fall).

Tuition fees for junior and senior kindergarten at the York School rose to $18,900, up from $18,100 last year, an increase of four per cent, while fees for grades 1 to 12 climbed from $21,700 to $22,700, an increase of five per cent. There's also a additional one-time registration fee of $4,000 for new students.

Memorial recalls Tel Aviv attack on gays, lesbians

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

The slight chill and heavy winds did little to deter the crowd that showed up to honour the memory of two recently murdered Israelis.

Held on the rooftop of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, approximately 85 people attended the Aug. 25 vigil for Nir Katz and Liz Trubeshi, who were killed in the attack on a Tel Aviv centre for gays and lesbians on Aug. 1. At least a dozen others were injured by the masked gunman.

The vigil was organized by Kulanu Toronto and the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIF). Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, Justine Apple of Kulanu, a gay and lesbian social group for young people, and Naomi Kramer of NIF spoke at the podium, which was flanked by rainbow flags. Rabbi Ed Elkin of the First Narayever Congregation and Rabbi Aaron Levy of the Kiever Synagogue said prayers for the victims.

Apple kicked off the vigil by speaking about the Aug. 1 attack.

"Tonight we come together to mourn the inextricable reality of hate towards the gay community. Above all, we are here to mourn the loss of Nir and Liz," she said.

"These two young Israelis, who while providing support to their peers, were met with terror and with violence. We send our deepest condolences to both of their families, to their friends and to their loved ones, who are left to pick up the pieces after this senseless act of violence.

"We are also here to pray for the dozen or so youth who were injured in the attack, and we wish them a speedy recovery."

Farber next spoke about the deep understanding the Jewish community has of the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) community.

"While this is a terrible reason to be together, it is an important opportunity for all of us to stand in solidarity with the LGBT community, which still finds itself the target of hateful attacks. Who would have thought as we entered the 21st century that vestiges of hate and ignorance would still prevail?" he asked.

"Sadly, we in the Jewish community understand all too well what it feels like to be hated simply for who we are. We have seen that hatred manifested in any number of ways, but rather than making us fearful, it has only strengthened our resolve," Farber said, adding that the attack can act as a warning against complacency.

"We all have the right to live free from fear that we will be attacked simply for being ourselves. Standing up for that right is simply the correct thing to do."

Kramer spoke next about breaking the silence.

"We hope that [this tragedy] will serve as a wake-up call at a time when Israel is polarized, minorities are threatened, and racist, sexist and homophobic incitement grows louder," she said.

"Today, we are here to say that not only Israelis, but everyone, must raise our voice… As individuals, we can raise our voices in our own community, however difficult that may be. We can use organizations in place to help us protest against all forms of hate.

"By being silent, have we allowed hate to seem normal?"

Jewish day schools on alert for swine flu

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In addition to using common sense in trying to prevent the spread of the H1N1 virus when school opens next week, educators are hopeful that worst-case scenarios won't materialize, said Sonia Shron, executive director of Bialik Hebrew Day School.

After a recent meeting of the school's medical advisory committee, comprised of doctors who are parents at the school, it was decided that committee members would work with teachers to teach children hand-washing techniques, have hand sanitizers in all classrooms and public areas, and send home regular updates, Shron said.

"We're also going to ask parents to keep children home if they have any symptoms, and if a child is sent home, he will be kept in an isolation room until he is picked up."

Shron said the school is asking the cleaning staff to concentrate on areas that children touch a lot, such as faucets and doorknobs.

Arthur Landa, executive director of Associated Hebrew Schools, said he has been thinking about how the school would deal with the threat of H1N1 since he read about how camps in Muskoka coped with it this summer.

"We're in the process of creating a policy document detailing the responsibilities and expectations of all students, parents, staff, visitors – anyone who enters the school," he said. "Basically, they're told to use hand sanitizers, cover their mouth when they cough or sneeze, and stay home if they feel sick."

He said the policy is based on information Associated has received from the Public Health Agency of Canada. "They give us directions about whether we should close the school. We don't decide on our own."

He said that teachers will keep their eyes open for any child who may be ill, and they will be given age-appropriate material to share with their students.

At Leo Baeck Day School, head of school Eric Petersiel said he's relying on public health experts. "We're members of the National Association of Private Schools in North America, and they also have issued protocols. Together, we try to put together a single, coherent policy that will keep everyone safe."

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said his school is also using a common-sense approach to dealing with H1N1. "If I knew how to prevent it, I'd be rich and famous."

He said his staff is following the advice of public health agencies and other school boards, "and we're waiting to see what the new year brings.

"We'll monitor things closely, but we're dealing with young adults. They should know to do the right thing."

Writer named to human rights panel

Joins honorary council of Canadian Centre for International Justice

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Erna Paris, an award-winning Toronto-based writer who has focused on international human rights abuses in several books, has been named to a Canadian panel that focuses on global human rights abuses in a world awash with injustices.

Paris was recently asked to join the honorary council of the Canadian Centre for International Justice (CCIJ), whose members include former NDP leader Ed Broadbent and Flora MacDonald, a former foreign minister.

In co-operation with survivors of genocide, torture and other atrocities, the CCIJ strives to bring perpetrators to trial.

"I must say I was humbled by this invitation, especially when I was told about the distinguished company I'd be keeping," said Paris in an interview last week. "When one works alone, as all writers do, it is a thrill to be recognized."

Jayne Stoyles, executive director of the CCIJ, said Paris was chosen because of her "outstanding work" as an author and her understanding of the role of the emerging system of international justice.

"She brings to us a wealth of expertise and contacts, and beyond that, she is just a wonderfully warm and committed individual."

Born and educated in Toronto, Paris began her career as a magazine journalist, book reviewer and radio broadcaster before turning to writing non-fiction.

The first of her seven books, Jews: An Account of Their Experience in Canada, was followed by Stepfamilies: Making Them Work, Unhealed Wounds: France and the Klaus Barbie Affair, The Garden and the Gun: A Journey Inside Israel, The End of Days: Tolerance, Tyranny and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain and Long Shadows: Truth, Lies and History.

Her latest book, published in Canada last year, was The Sun Climbs Slow: Justice in the Age of Imperial America, a historical account of global justice and the politics behind the United States' opposition to the establishment of a permanent international criminal court.

Asked what she can contribute to the CCIJ, Paris – chair of the Writers' Union of Canada – replied, "I don't know yet, but its interests mesh closely with my own, so I'll find my way."

She thinks highly of the CCIJ.

"It's an important organization because there are an estimated 1,500 war criminals living in Canada. Many of these people arrived here as refugees after the genocides in Rwanda, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Darfur. They joined Holocaust-era criminals who were never properly brought to justice.

"The CCIJ is pushing hard to bring as many of them as possible to trial in our courts as a national complement to the global work of the International Criminal Court. It's possible to do this now, because in 2000, the Canadian government passed the Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act, which incorporated these so-called international crimes into our domestic law."

Erna Paris

She cited the Desire Munyaneza case as an example. Last May, the CCIJ scored a major breakthrough when a Quebec court convicted Munyaneza – a Rwandan living in Canada – for his role in the 1994 massacres in the African nation of Rwanda.

"This was Canada's first use of the new law, and the court's decision was praised internationally as a landmark in the protection of human rights."

Paris said the CCIJ is planning more legal interventions and also helping refugees and immigrants who were subjected to torture and now seek legal recourse.

In her judgment, the worst human rights violations today occur in Africa, "where hundreds of thousands of civilians have been killed, mutilated and rendered homeless and where children have been abducted into murderous gangs and sometimes forced to murder members of their own families."

Such crimes have occurred in such countries as Sudan, Congo, Uganda and the Central African Republic.

Turning to the issue of war criminals in Canada, Paris said the CCIJ has met with Canadian Jewish Congress and is ready to back a campaign aimed at individuals implicated in the murder of Jews during the Holocaust.

"The Jewish community has called for war crimes trials for decades, to little avail. And in the 1990s, years of Canadian government inaction were compounded when the Supreme Court allowed a defence of 'following orders' in the notorious case of Imra Finta."

Asked whether Israel violated international law when it invaded Gaza last winter, Paris said, "This is the subject of Justice Richard Goldstone's inquiry, which is expected to report soon. He is one of the world's most respected jurists, and a Jew. There is no one on the international legal stage with more credibility in terms of character, integrity and objectivity.

"This is why it is a pity, in my opinion, that Israel has so far refused to co-operate. But even without formal co-operation, Goldstone has interviewed Israelis who were victims of Hamas rocket attacks. His conclusions will be taken very seriously by the international community and also by Israeli leaders, I'm sure, even if they deny this publicly."

Asked to compare the way the rule of law is observed in Israel versus the Arab world, she said, "There's no comparison. Within its borders, Israel has an internationally respected justice system, while most Arab countries do not."

Paris said that while the Obama administration has not formally withdrawn U.S. opposition to the creation of a permanent international criminal court, it has eased its position.

"In doing this, it has merely continued a warming that began under the Bush administration, which effectively allowed a vote to go through the United Nations Security Council to refer the genocide in Darfur to the International Criminal Court for investigation."

Paris' interest in human rights stems from an early 1960s visit to a deserted Nazi death camp in the Vosges mountains of France.

"A guide showed me the gas chamber and dissection tables. Prisoners had been transferred there from Auschwitz. No one was talking about such things in those days, least of all the French.

"Although I didn't begin to research and write books until 15 or 16 years later, I believe it was that shocking visit that unconsciously shaped my future as a writer, starting with a study of French historical memory in Unhealed Wounds: France and the Klaus Barbie Affair."

Recent wars have stabilized Israel's borders: MK

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel has stabilized its northern and southern borders since the wars with Hezbollah in the summer of 2006 and with Hamas late last year and early in 2009, claims a Kadima party member of Knesset.

"They had a huge effect, no doubt," said Nachman Shai, a leading commentator on Israeli television and radio, in an interview from Israel last week.

Shai, who served as the spokesperson for the Israeli armed forces during the 1991 Gulf War, said that Israel's vigorous military campaigns in Lebanon and Gaza restored Israel's deterrent power, though the situation can change abruptly should another crisis erupt.

Nachman Shai

"Deterrence worked," said Shai, a brigadier general in the reserves who is scheduled to help launch the UIA Federations Canada annual campaign in Canada on Sept. 10.

In Shai's view, the unofficial ceasefire between Israel and Hamas may last indefinitely, even though Palestinian armed groups based in Gaza continue to fire rockets into Israel periodically.

"Hamas also has a strong interest in maintaining the truce so that it can rebuild Gaza," noted Shai, referring to the widespread destruction caused by Israel's land and air offensive. "I don't know how long the ceasefire will hold, but we'd like it to go on."

As for Hezbollah's observance of the United Nations truce, Shai said, "I don't think they're interested in another war."

But in a reference to Hezbollah bases in southern Lebanon, Shai, currently the director general of the United Jewish Communities organization in Israel, said, "We have warned them not to get too close to the border."

In reply to a question, Shai said that the Israeli government should not negotiate with Hamas unless it renounces terrorism and promises to abide by agreements signed by the Palestinian Authority and Israel.

Unofficial ceasefire with Hamas may last indefinitely, says Shai

He does not exclude the possibility that Fatah – a mainstream Palestinian faction controlled by PA President Mahmoud Abbas – may wrest Gaza away from Hamas.

But he's certain the Israeli army won't permit Hamas to take over the West Bank, which is administered by Fatah.

Shai, whose centrist party declined to join Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's right-of-centre coalition government, sees no reason why Netanyahu is demanding Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. "Israel doesn't need it."

Shai said the Israeli government shouldn't impose preconditions on the PA before a resumption of direct talks with Israel.

Asked whether he agrees with an assertion by Kadima leader Tzipi Livni that Netanyahu wasn't sincere when he recently recognized the concept of a two-state solution, Shai replied, "There's much truth in that."

MK says Iran sanctions not strong enough

Shai said he's not sure whether Netanyahu sincerely desires talks with the Palestinians, since such negotiations could well alienate his right-wing partners and break up the coalition.

Nonetheless, Shai predicted that new talks will begin, since the United States has called for them. (Last week, the U.S. State Department announced that Israel and the Palestinians were closer than ever to restarting bilateral negotiations, which ended after Israel's previous prime minister, Ehud Olmert, resigned).

Israel should respond "positively" to Washington's call for a broad settlement freeze in the West Bank to encourage an atmosphere conducive to negotiations, Shai said.

"We should should look for a compromise, and we should make make some concessions."

According to Shai, there's a chance that Israel and Syria may resume indirect talks through the good offices of Turkey. "Both sides have expressed an interest."

Israel isn't obliged to meet Syria's demand for a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, he said. "Both parties should have an open mind. Let's see how it goes. Syria will find Israel forthcoming."

Speculating that Netanyahu may yet decide to engage the Syrians, Shai said he doubts whether Israel will enter into substantive talks with Syria and the Palestinians simultaneously.

Asked whether Israel should accept the Arab League's peace initiative – which calls for a full Israeli pullout from territories conquered by Israel during the Six Day War in exchange for Arab recognition and normalization – Shai talked about its "positive elements."

He added, "It can serve as a basis for negotiations."

Shai contended that the international community, not Israel, should mobilize public opinion against Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal.

But he acknowledged that the economic sanctions imposed on Iran by the United Nations until now haven't gone far enough.

Though he refused to be drawn into a discussion on the possibility of an Israeli military strike on Iran's nuclear sites, he said, "The military option should be on the table."

Shai is due to speak in Toronto on Sept. 10 and in Halifax on Sept. 13.

Exhibit showcases work of renowned photographer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto's world-renowned and award-winning photographer, Al Gilbert, has 40 of his photographs on exhibit in the mezzanine at Beth Tzedec Congregation until Nov. 27.

The exhibit, titled A Glimpse of Greatness: The Portraiture of Al Gilbert, is a sample of the thousands of his pictures that he's donating to the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA).

On the main floor of the shul are early photographs of the Gilbert family from the 1920s and '30s. They tell the story of Gilbert's father, Nathan, who was born in Kiev, Ukraine, and came to Canada in 1921 with his wife and son, Louis.

Shortly after his arrival in Canada, Nathan opened Elite Studio on Queen Street West in the centre of Jewish immigrant life in Toronto.

As a young boy in the 1930s, Gilbert worked with his father on glass plates and darkroom retouching.

"My father was printing all day, and he let me dry them," Gilbert said. "At that time, my father did mostly ethnic weddings and portraits."

After his father moved to the United States in the early 1940s, Gilbert changed the name to Gilbert Studios, moved to Eglinton Avenue and later to Davenport Road, where he is situated today.

For more than 60 years, Gilbert has been sought after worldwide by diverse subjects in politics and the arts, as well as luminaries from every segment of the population.

From his early work with his father's large Kodak Century camera, Gilbert has been a leader in the latest photographic methods, including digital photography and the use of wide angle lenses, fish-eye photography and double-exposure techniques.

Archives director Ellen Scheinberg started working on the exhibit with Gilbert two years ago. She was assisted by Beth Tzedec's museum curator, Dorion Liebgott.

Scheinberg told The CJN that Gilbert donated some 1,400 negatives to the archives during the 1990s, and he donated 84 of his best portraits in 2007.

"I wanted to put together this display in order to honour Al and to thank him for his donation to the archives," Scheinberg said.

"He is also planning to donate the entirety of his holdings to us over the next few years, and the community is very grateful that he chose the OJA as his official repository."

Among the photographs in the exhibition at Beth Tzedec are former Canadian prime ministers John Diefenbaker and John Turner; former Toronto mayor Mel Lastman; writer Robertson Davies; entertainers Frank Sinatra, Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster, Moe Kaufman, Oscar Peterson, Liona Boyd and Dizzy Gillespie; CNN host Larry King; founding Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion, and businessman Ed Mirvish, as well as community leaders such as Joey and Toby Tanenbaum, who sponsored the exhibition.

Over the years, Gilbert's subjects have included religious leaders of every faith, including Martin Luther King Jr., and almost all of Israel's prime ministers and presidents.

Gilbert, who is a sought-after speaker, holds a master's in photography and has authored two books, A Portfolio (1994), and Al Gilbert Master Portraiture (2002).

He is a three-time recipient of the prestigious Professional Photographers of Canada (PPOC) award as photographer of the year, as well as the first recipient of the Yousuf Karsh Award. He was also awarded the Confederation Medal of Canada in 1992.

He was named to the Order of Canada in 1990, and in 2007, he was awarded the Professional Photographers of America's Lifetime Achievement Award.

"For a long time, nobody cared about past community leaders," Gilbert told The CJN about his large donation to the OJA. "I am thrilled that the archives has recognized the importance of recording the Jewish community. I am happy that now there will be a permanent place for images and bios to be kept of our community leaders."

He added that although he is starting to slow down, he's reluctant to close his studio.

"I am following my father's advice," he said. "Never stop, because tomorrow you may produce your finest image."

The Beth Tzedec exhibition will travel to other locations after Nov. 27. For more information, contact Scheinberg at 416-635-2883, ext. 5187, or visit www.ontariojewisharchives.org.

Israeli researcher finds natural cure for insomnia

Hormone prepares the body for sleep

By ILANA TEITELBAUM
ISRAEL21C

Traditional sleeping pills have many side effects. Now an Israeli company is introducing a new drug that works with the body's natural processes to induce restful, restorative sleep.

When that good night's sleep becomes elusive, sometimes the only option is medication. But the sleeping pills now on the market often come with risks that may outweigh the benefits, inducing dependency, withdrawal symptoms, and occasionally even cognitive impairments such as short-term amnesia.

Not so with Circadin, a new drug produced by Neurim Pharmaceuticals and based on the research of company founder and chief scientific officer Nava Zisapel at Tel Aviv University (TAU).

Unlike other sleep medications which suppress brain activity, Neurim says that Circadin works with the body's natural processes to induce a restful, restorative sleep. It does so by gradually releasing melatonin in the body – the hormone that prepares the body for sleep.

Possibly the worst aspect of insomnia is its deleterious effect on daytime functioning. That's where Circadin has an additional edge over its competitors.

"Circadin not only improves the onset of sleep, but also the quality of sleep," Zisapel, a neuroscientist, tells ISRAEL21c. "People who take the drug have reported that they have better daytime functioning and an improved quality of life."

The drug is already being distributed in Israel and some countries in Europe by Neurim, which was set up in 1991 by Zisapel and her husband, entrepreneur Yehuda Zisapel (founder of the RAD Group), to develop treatments for age-related disorders. It is now in the process of obtaining approval from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

Melatonin is produced in the body at the onset of darkness, preparing the body physiologically by lowering the blood pressure and body temperature. Its primary function is to separate day and night in the body's internal biological clock.

Since darkness is a trigger of melatonin, strong fluorescent lights can suppress its production. But other factors may also be involved: anxiety, depression, or simply aging can suppress the production of melatonin and cause insomnia.

"People may start sleeping less well when they age," Zisapel points out. "The brain structure changes with age, and may lose the ability to produce melatonin if the pineal gland becomes calcified. It doesn't happen to everyone at the same age, but in general, people who begin to get gray hair are losing the ability to produce melatonin."

Circadin is therefore a hormone replacement therapy that becomes applicable if the pineal gland – the gland that produces melatonin – stops doing its job sufficiently.

For some, getting a good night's sleep remains elusive. Neurim Pharmaceuticals hopes to change all that with its new drug Circadin. [Nati Shohat/Flash90 photo]

Zisapel describes how Circadin works in a way that mimics the activity of the pineal gland. "Circadin produces melatonin in the same way as the gland. It starts slowly at around 10:00 p.m., gets to a peak at around 2:00 a.m., and gradually stops by the morning. It releases melatonin in a gradual manner."

In reaching this point, it's been a long road for Zisapel, who began developing the formula in 1992 in her neurobiology lab at TAU. Because Circadin was a new kind of sleep medication, regulators insisted on much more clinical data than they had with other medications. The drug was finally approved for the market in Europe in 2007.

Zisapel became interested in the effects of melatonin during her post-doctoral work at Weizmann Institute, and researched the hormone's effect on animals for a decade before beginning to apply that research to humans. Now she is also researching a treatment for Parkinson's disease, as well as a treatment for insomnia that is induced by pain and depression.

Circadin recently completed a clinical trial in the United States, which tested the drug for its efficacy in patients between the ages of 18 and 55. Until then, the target population for the drug was patients over 55, but the FDA required that Neurim, which has RAD in Tel Aviv and business development in Switzerland, expands its research to include younger patients.

"We just finished one study that shows what's going on in the whole population over 18 and the drug is still effective, but we feel that patients aged 55 and older benefit the most," says Zisapel.

Anti-Israel profs should be outed, conference told

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Anti-Israel college faculty and administrators should be exposed and ridiculed, the director of a Jerusalem-based think-tank told a conference at Concordia University on how to defend Israel on campus.

"Naming and shaming" is effective in countering professors who are openly biased against Israel, Manfred Gerstenfeld, director of the Institute for Global Jewish Affairs, said.

Other methods that should be considered, he said, are establishing a data bank of "our enemies," ranking universities as "promoters of evil" and "bringing down" a university president who doesn't take action against faculty shown to be maligners of Israel.

"We have to make our enemies fear us," he said. "We must attack, not defend."

Gerstenfeld, author of Academics Against Israel and the Jews, was a guest speaker at a day-long conference organized by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR).

"We should never let our enemies have a free anti-Semitic lunch," he said.

The conventional methods of combating Israel's foes on campus favoured by "the establishment" are not working, said Gerstenfeld, who doesn't hesitate to use the term "enemies," whether they are teachers or students.

Public discourse, newspaper articles and legal means "ean't lead to lasting results… They are insufficient in the real world."

He urged students to monitor and document behaviour of their teachers that they consider to be "intellectually corrupt" or who are "using the university to promote hate," and take the evidence to the administration.

He includes those who accuse Israel of practising apartheid and call for its boycott.

If the university doesn't discipline that faculty member, its head should be ousted, he suggested. "Administrations are weak. If one university president is brought down, it makes a thousand others fear it will happen to them."

This is not only a fight for Israel, he maintained, but for western civilization.

Fellow panelist Alvin Rosenfeld agreed that those who abuse academic freedom to spread lies about Israel should be held accountable. He is the University of Indiana professor whose 2006 essay contending that extreme left-wing Jewish critics of Israel are aiding the state's enemies and contributing to the new wave of anti-Semitism stirred a controversy that reached the op-ed pages of the New York Times.

Academics "passing propaganda off as scholarship" should be brought to the attention of their department heads or the university administration if necessary – by their colleagues, he said.

Trying to engage in rational dialogue with those who see "the Jewish state as aberrant" is probably useless, he said.

However, Rosenfeld urged Israel supporters to "pick your battles."

"Not everything that irritates us has to be responded to. Israeli Apartheid Week [IAW] is part of the political theatre that goes on on campuses. I'd ignore it."

His reaction was the same to the 1,300 "graves" that appeared on the McGill University grounds in April, apparently representing Palestinian deaths in the war in Gaza that ended in January. "Most people who see it are going to say it's silly and stupid and forget about it," Rosenfeld said.

Anti-Israel events overwhelmingly attract those who are already opposed to Israel, he said, and most "will blow over and probably do no harm."

He has never been on a campus during IAW, he said, but "my guess is that it attracts a miniscule number of students who are not Muslim or anti-Zionist Jews."

Rosenfeld, who is director of the Institute of Jewish Culture and the Arts, stated that "radicalized Muslims and anti-Zionist Jews," whom he termed "mixed up," are behind "almost all" anti-Israel activities at universities.

"It would greatly diminish, if not disappear altogether," without them.

He described the University of Indiana, where he has taught since 1968, as very pro-Jewish at the student, staff and administrative levels, even though there are a large number of Arab and Muslim students. He attributes that to a long-standing effort to foster a positive image of Israel through the curriculum and cultural events.

The situation is very different at the University of California at Santa Cruz, according to Tammi Benjamin, a professor of Hebrew there, who led efforts to rein in faculty members she believes using their classrooms and status as scholars to spread "lies, distortions and half-truths" about Israel.

She is convinced that what they are doing is anti-Semitic according to the U.S. government's definition.

When she complained to the academic senate, she was accused of trying to stifle academic freedom and was the subject of an investigation herself, she said.

The experience has led her to believe that "outside pressure" is necessary to change the situation. She suggested Jewish students not attend universities with anti-Israel bias and that donors withhold their money from them.

"It's not the responsibility of Jewish students to fix the problem. Students should be concentrating on their studies… They can get into trouble for telling on professors. I personally don't think they should do it. It's up to the faculty and Jewish community to fight this battle."

Elsewhere at the conference, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre, who gave the keynote address, suggested that financial supporters of Israeli universities "send the message that we are a little sick of their sending academics [to North America] who say basically Israel is a state that should not exist… How we define ourselves as Jews should never be called into question, and if it is, we shouldn't have to pay the bill."

CIJR founder and director Frederick Krantz, a Concordia professor, said he sees the conference as the beginning of an effort to establish a continent-wide strategy to defend Israel and western values on campus.

The CIJR, now in its 21st year, is on the verge of incorporation in the United States under the name International Institute for Jewish Research.

Seminars help students combat anti-Semitism

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

When we are faced with adversity, we can wait out the problem or we can take action. Rebecca Katz chose the latter course and became involved with pro-Israel advocacy.

She recently attended The David Project Campus Fellows Seminar, a four-day Israel education and leadership program.

Now in its fifth year, The David Project Center for Jewish Leadership is a non-profit organization that promotes pro-Israel advocacy and activism among North American college students, teaching them the skills necessary to combat misinformation regarding Israel and bring Israel-related campus initiatives and events to their schools.

Katz, 21, is a law student going into her third year at McGill University in Montreal. She said she had not paid much attention to the situation in Israel during her first year of university, but by her second, what was happening on campus in regard to the conflict had become undeniable and deeply troubling.

"It was such a disproportionate reaction to the conflict in the Middle East," she says of the anti-Israel sentiment on campus. "I can understand it's problematic – I have sympathy for Palestinian people, too. But from what I observed, the kinds of campaigns being waged and the things they said about Israel, this was completely hateful and irrational."

She decided to get involved in pro-Israel advocacy, and last year, started interning for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), where she was responsible for administrative work such as fact-checking and media monitoring.

It was during her time at the CIJR that she learned of The David Project and, wanting to further her work in the field of Jewish activism, she applied for the fellowship program.

More than 100 students attended the seminar, which was held at Boston University in August. The program was fairly intensive, with an emphasis on lectures and class discussions, and was structured to allow the students to immerse themselves in their studies without unnecessary distraction, which meant there was little free time to explore Boston.

> "There are other things to the Israel 'brand' than just conflict and problems"

"We actually didn't do much travelling. We did a lot of sitting around in the Hillel house, we had our meals together, we sat around in our classes together… After dinner, we would go to the dormitory [where] there was a lounge, and in the evenings, we would watch a film and continue our discussions there," she says.

"We were together extensively and that was a very good way to meet people, as well."

Katz knew one other student on her program, someone she took a class with at McGill and who, coincidentally, also interned at CIJR. Although they hadn't had much communication before the trip, The David Project gave them time to interact and find common bonds that extended into the outside world.

Katz was appreciative of this opportunity and says it's important to "always try to meet other like-minded people so that you don't feel alone, and hopefully you don't have to try and organize or do anything alone."

The David Project is not geared solely towards Jewish youth, Katz says. In fact, several non-Jews have participated in the program. She says she is very much in favour of this all-inclusive approach to Jewish activism.

"One of our staff members was a young American Christian woman who's very concerned about Israel – that's not atypical for The David Project to do. As well, I think it was just amazing meeting all these people who have some similar concerns, even though we're coming from tremendously different backgrounds."

Katz now refers to The David Project as "a second home," not just in the way it educates and accommodates its participants, but also in the way the organization keeps in touch with them long after the initial program has ended, providing them with invaluable resources and support for years to come.

"It is vitally necessary to have these kinds of resources to draw upon and these kinds of relationships to keep up… The David Project is there to help students on an ongoing basis it's not just a one-time thing and you're gone, " she says.

"When you have an opportunity to re-brand Israel, I think that's important. To show people that there are other things to the Israel 'brand' than just conflict and problems and Jews and Arabs fighting each other.

"I am hoping that I'll have the time and the energy to take a more active role to counter the accusations… [and] to show people a much broader picture of all the positive things Israel has contributed to the world."

First Israeli hockey stamp created by a Canadian

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israelis can now slapshot a letter into the top corner of their local mailbox after affixing the country's first hockey-themed postage stamp.

Commissioned by the Israel Ice Hockey Federation as part of a PR campaign during its annual World Jewish Ice Hockey Championships – played in July at the Canada Center in Metulla – the limited edition stamp was created by Irving Osterer, a Canadian graphic artist and graphic design instructor at Ottawa's Merivale High School.

Speaking to The CJN last week from his office in Ottawa, Osterer – an Israeli hockey fan and member of the Ottawa chapter of Friends of Israeli Hockey – called the project a "dream come true."

"I've collected Israeli stamps since I was a kid. I've learned so much history and geography from them, [and] I've always been fascinated with the whole image-making process of stamps," he said. "I've always wanted to contribute to the Jewish People, and this was my way to do it."

Irving Osterer

Osterer said he became aware of the project from contacts he's made through the Friends of Israeli Hockey earlier this year, and decided to step up and offer his design expertise and time to make the stamp.

The postage stamp features a photo of defenceman Ron Soreanu, a veteran of Israel's national hockey team and an Ottawa resident.

Osterer said he simply asked Soreanu if he'd pose for a picture while wearing the Israeli national team sweater – which he did enthusiastically – and that's all it took to get the shoot done.

Osterer said he received several suggestions to facilitate the stamp's production – done in Canada – from stamp dealer Isidore Baum, proprietor of Montreal's Judaica Sales Limited. Meanwhile, Yael Kostas and Vered Shilsel at the Israel Philatelic Service supervised the production of the special stamps, the postmark die and the cancellation of the covers.

According to Osterer, the hockey postmark "will have an official catalogue number in the Israeli commemorative cancels catalogue, and will be listed on the Israel Philatelic Federation website. The finished covers are a wonderful souvenir of the event and are hand numbered from one to 500."

For those who don't know, apparently any major event can be considered for commemoration via a photo-stamp by both the Israel Postal Company and Canada Post.

"Anyone can do it," Osterer said, adding all that's necessary is the ability to come up with a winning design, meet the digital and stylistic specifications and front the approximately $1,500 that it would cost to produce the material for printing.

Osterer's costs were lowered because he has the technical and artistic expertise to put the stamp's imagery together and volunteered his time.

He said he received additional financial support from the Arnon Corporation in Ottawa. Arnon's president, Arnie Vered, has a son and a nephew who both played for Team Canada "Red," the gold medal winner in this year's under-18 tournament.

Making the stamp "was a labour of love," Osterer said. "It's the realization of a dream."

All proceeds from the sale of the stamp will go to supporting hockey programs in Israel.

Que. religions course seen incompatible with Torah

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A new group called the Council on Jewish Education in Quebec (CJEQ) has declared that the province's compulsory ethics and religious culture school course (ERC) is incompatible with Torah law, and that Jewish day schools should forgo government funding if modifications aren't made to the curriculum.

The CJEQ placed a third-of-a-page advertisement on page 3 of Montreal's Gazette Aug. 21, which according the paper cost between $6,000 and $7,000, saying the course should allow teachers in Jewish schools to "pass a value judgment on the beliefs being studied."

"Torah law requires Jews to epistemologically recognize the prophecy of Moses as absolute eternal truth, which cannot be contradicted by any other prophet. Therefore, when a Jewish school class studies a belief that is incompatible with the prophecy of Moses (e.g. atheism), the Jewish teacher is obligated to identify the incompatible belief as false," the ad reads.

As an alternative, the CJEQ suggests that Jewish schools be permitted to teach only the Noahide Code, which, according to Jewish belief, are the seven laws of moral behaviour God gave to Noah to spread among all humanity.

The CJEQ insists that Jewish schools must limit religious teaching to Judaism and the Noahide Code.

The ERC, introduced for all elementary and high schools last year, is intended to acquaint students with the major religions of Quebec – Catholicism, Protestantism, Judaism and native spirituality – and survey other world beliefs, including secularism, while avoiding actually teaching any particular religion or passing judgment on their validity.

Rabbi Shalom Spira, the CJEQ's volunteer executive director, told The CJN the position was arrived at after consultation with 200 rabbis in Quebec, as well as rabbis J. David Bleich and Norman Lamm of Yeshiva University, a leading institution of modern Orthodoxy in New York, of which Rabbi Spira is a graduate.

The position represents "a consensus of rabbinic opinion," he said, backed as well by study of the historic rabbinic responsa.

While it's not ideal, he said Jewish schools could teach about Christianity, for example, but students must not be left with the impression that it is equal to Judaism.

The Torah, he noted, requires Jews to respect every human being and that can be accomplished through the teaching of the Noahide Code.

The CJEQ draws the line at any teaching of atheism. "That is not kosher at all," he said.

According to its six-page constitution, the CJEQ was formed as "an ad hoc organization… to serve the Quebec Jewish community by providing a halachically correct response to" the ERC "as a public education and service."

The CJEQ is respectful in how it addresses the provincial government, referring to it as "righteous and honourable" and its intention of promoting understanding and tolerance as a noble pursuit.

"We 100 per cent applaud the government in its aims. It deserves praise," Rabbi Spira said.

As for suggesting schools give up government funding if it comes down to a choice between violating the Torah and following secular law, Rabbi Spira said this has been put on the table because that is what Jewish sources prescribe.

"Jews are permitted by Torah law to earn their own livelihoods and thereby support their own schools [Talmud, Berakhot 35b]," the ad states. "Thus, Jewish schools are expected to follow [Torah law] irrespective of financial considerations."

The point the CJEQ is trying to make, Rabbi Spira said, is that "we cannot forfeit our loyalty to Torah for financial reasons," and although compliance with civil law is a cornerstone of Jewish teaching, a line has to be drawn. "If a government asked us to start a fire on Shabbat, we couldn't do it," he said.

He acknowledged the point may be moot, because all schools in Quebec, whether they receive funding or not, are obliged to follow the province's prescribed curriculum.

Rabbi Spira is spiritual leader of Congregation Kol Yehouda, a small Sephardi synagogue in Côte St. Luc (although he is Ashkenazi himself) and a research assistant at the McGill AIDS Centre based at the Jewish General Hospital. His position as the CJEQ's executive director is voluntary, he said.

The CJEQ's head is Rabbi David Cadoch, who, according to the CJEQ constitution, is a qualified rabbinic judge and has taught in the Jewish day school system.

The CJEQ was formed last December, but is not legally incorporated. It does not represent any schools or parents, Rabbi Spira said, nor has it made any direct contact with the government or education department to present its position.

Although he calls it a "grassroots organization," Rabbi Spira was vague about who else makes up the council, other than the 100 members of the congregation he leads.

Rabbi Spira is not a parent, but Rabbi Cadoch does have children in school, he said.

Although he uses a Yeshiva University e-mail address, Rabbi Spira said that institution is not endorsing the opinions expressed because it doesn't want to interfere in a Canadian matter.

The goal is to make that rabbinical opinion on this issue available to as many Jews as possible, and that's why the group chose to purchase a prominent ad in a daily newspaper.

"We hope others will share our position and sign on. But we do not want to detract from those who do not share our opinion. There can be a healthy debate."

Jewish organizations receive security funding

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish organizations are receiving a total of $223,000 in grants from the federal government to improve their security.

Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, announced the funding at a press conference Aug. 28 at Federation CJA, which co-ordinates Jewish organizations' applications to the Communities at Risk: Security Infrastructure Pilot Program (SIP), introduced by the Harper government two years ago.

SIP helps defray the cost of security infrastructure upgrades at not-for-profit community centres, educational institutions and places of worship linked to a community with a history of being victimized by hate-motivated crime, or its threat.

The recipients are: the YM-YWHA/Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in Snowdon, outside of which an explosive device was detonated in 2007 ($70,600); the Beth Jacob de Rav Hirschprung School in Outremont ($47,000); Hebrew Academy in Côte St. Luc ($25,400); Centre de la Petite Enfance of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools ($14,700); Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux ($14,618); Rabbinat Sépharade du Québec in Snowdon ($12,400); Solomon Schechter Academy in Snowdon ($11,700); Beth Rivkah Academy in Côte des Neiges ($9,750); Communauté Sépharade Hekhal Shalom in St. Laurent ($9,550); and Shaare Zedek Congregation in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce ($7,285).

The grants must be matched dollar-for-dollar by the recipients.

Six other Montreal Jewish organizations received a total of over $144,000 in the first round of grants last year under SIP, a three-year, $3-million pilot project.

According to Public Safety Canada's website, "the SIP Program has approved funding for 55 organizations across Canada" since its inception in 2007. Of those, 46 – or 84 per cent – have been awarded to Jewish community organizations.

"No community should live in fear… It's unacceptable that any group should be victimized for their race, religion or culture," Kenney said, noting there were nearly 800 hate crimes recorded in Canada last year.

Helping defray a community institution's security costs is in the public interest, he said. — J.A.

Swedish article an example of European bullying

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On Aug. 17, the prominent Swedish tabloid Aftonbladet published a story by freelance journalist Donald Bostrom in which he alleged that the Israeli army routinely harvests organs from Palestinians killed by Israeli soldiers. While the article received little coverage in Canada (with some exceptions, including this paper), it was fiercely debated in the Israeli and European media.

The Israeli coverage first centred around the charge that the Swedish paper was promoting an anti-Semitic "blood libel." The controversy continued when the Israeli government called on the Swedish government to condemn the article, only to be met by a Swedish defence of press freedom. However, according to a news service article in Ha'aretz ("Sweden to probe complaints against IDF organ harvesting article," Aug. 25), Sweden's government is now investigating whether Aftonbladet broke the law dealing with incitement to hatred.

Meanwhile, a columnist in Britain's Guardian was quick to defend the Swedish journalist.

In "Israel cries wolf over 'blood libel,'" (Aug. 24), Seth Freedman acknowledged that the piece was "journalism of the worst kind: based on the flimsiest of evidence, making tenuous connections on little more than pure conjecture and relying on dubious testimony in the absence of hard fact and proof."

But, he added, "bad journalism does not automatically an anti-Semite make, especially when the allegations were directed at the Israeli army, rather than at Judaism and its practices."

Freedman argued that only if Aftonbladet had explicitly accused Jews of an actual blood libel – that is, of killing Christian children to use their blood for ritual purposes, as was the charge first made in medieval Europe – then the paper would be guilty of promoting anti-Semitism. The sheer idiocy of Freedman's argument is breathtaking, but it's unfortunately par for the course when it comes to bashing Israel in much of the European media.

Freedman (along with others like him) has a convenient fallback position: Israel and its defenders "routinely allege that criticism of Israel is in fact thinly disguised anti-Semitism." This, too, is nonsense, since criticism of Israeli policies is wide and abundant in the media without the charge of anti-Semitism being levelled.

With respect to the British and European anti-Israel obsession exhibited by Freedman in the Guardian, the words of Canadian novelist and essayist Stephen Marche bear attention.

In "Calling Europe on its hypocrisy" (National Post, Aug. 1), Marche wrote: "Many in Europe still feel perfectly confident saying one thing at home and doing something else entirely abroad. The boycott of Israeli academics by the British National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education was another perfect example: the leaders of the union attacked Israeli academics for neo-imperialism while their own country was involved in the occupation of Iraq. It never occurred to them that the Israelis had a much better case for boycotting Britain than the other way around."

He added: "The continent, which has lived for 300 years on the spoils of imperial adventure, still considers itself the natural moral arbiter of the world. The EU is like the bully in high school who has turned into a maudlin alcoholic in middle age."

No one writing in Canadian journalism has helped us understand this bullying phenomenon better than Robert Fulford. In his Aug. 15 National Post column, "When criticizing Israel becomes ritual," Fulford addressed the feverish obsession of those who constantly attack Israel: "The most distressing quality of the attacks, however, is their singularity. They leave us with the impression that Israel deserves more censure than any other country on Earth – in fact, more than all other countries combined."

Fulford's way of capturing this anti-Israel (and anti-Jewish) obsession is expressed by him in a phrase worth remembering: "the relentless and totally selective drumbeat."

Two Jewish women named to Senate

By JANICE ARNOLD and ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporters

Two Jewish women were among the list of nine new senators appointed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper to the upper house last week: Montrealer Judith Seidman and Torontonian Linda Frum-Sokolowski.

The appointment of Seidman, a Conservative party activist, came as a surprise to the organized Jewish community. Little-known outside the party and her professional engagements, Seidman was one of three Quebecers appointed to the Senate by Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week.

Judith Seidman

The others included former Montreal Canadiens coach Jacques Demers and lawyer Claude Carignan.

Seidman has been a Tory organizer for more than a decade, as well as a vice-president for Quebec on its national council for several years.

Seidman, trained as an epidemiologist and social worker, chaired Harper's campaign for the leadership of the new Conservative party in 2003, and she played a key role in organizing a major fundraiser for the party in Montreal earlier this year.

Robert Presser, who is active in the Conservative party and Quebec Jewish Congress, said he has known Seidman for about 12 years.

"She's a very open and willing person. I think she will be a very accessible to the Jewish community, and I really mean that," he said.

"I think the community will be pleasantly surprised over the long run."

He described her as an outstanding organizer and strategist with the energy and intellectual gifts to make a major contribution to the country.

Seidman, a grandmother, has been an educator, researcher and adviser to universities, government and non-profit agencies in the fields of health and social services. She was a senior researcher at the University Institute of Social Gerontology of Quebec and at the Montreal Neurological Institute's social work department.

Frum-Sokolowski is a noted Canadian journalist and author. A past contributor to Maclean's magazine and columnist for the National Post, she's also a current board member of Upper Canada College, the Bishop Strachan School, the Canadian Club and Canada's Walk of Fame, as well as a past board member of the Ontario Arts Council, Soulpepper Theatre, the Art Gallery of Ontario Foundation and the Canada-Israel Committee.

She was also the 2006 chair of the United Jewish Appeal's annual Women's Campaign.

Linda Frum-Sokolowski

Her husband, businessman Howard Sokolowski, is co-owner of the Toronto Argonauts.

Frum was one of two Ontarians appointed, the other being industrialist Doug Finley, who was the Conservative party's national campaign director in the 2006 and 2008 elections.

Writing on his political group blog, NewMajority.com last week, Frum's brother, David, said he was "proud and thrilled" for his sister, calling her a "woman of unique grace, talent and accomplishment."

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, hailed Frum's appointment.

"We offer our heartfelt mazal tov to Linda, one of our community's most devoted volunteers and a generous, genuine community leader on her appointment to the Senate," he said.

"Without a doubt, Canadians will be well served by her keen intelligence, her sense of civic responsibility, her commitment to community and Jewish values and her deep understanding of the international landscape."

The other senators appointed last week were Nova Scotian Kevin Ogilvie, a biochemist; Dennis Patterson of Nunavut, former premier of the Northwest Territories; Manitoban Don Plett, former president of the Conservative Party, and New Brunswick native Carolyn Stewart, who until recently served as senior adviser and director of strategic communication in the prime minister's office.

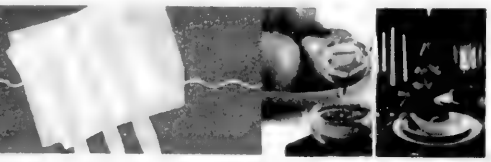
COMPLETING THE DREAM

Holiday Food Ideas



DANI presents cookbook ideas for you to try

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Almost four years ago, Kathy Laszlo and Susie Sokol joined together to form a group that would address the needs of young adult children with special needs.

Their mission was to create opportunities for young Jewish adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges to participate as valued members of the community, and enjoy a meaningful and dignified quality of Jewish life.

DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence) is a parent advocacy group that allows parents to share information, provide programming for their children and support each other in their day-to-day decisions.

In addition to weekly programming and Sunday recreational afternoons including swimming, music, baking challot and a luncheon series with seniors, since its inception, DANI has, among a host of other activities, provided three annual summer camp experiences, run Jewish holiday parties, participated in social action activities, collected food for the homeless and sold gift containers of baked goods.

One of their latest projects is Dani Delights, a cookbook that brings together recipes from parents, DANI kids and community "celebrities." A book signing by DANI kids takes place on Sept. 13 at the Israel Source from 11 a.m.-2 p.m. For more information, call 905-731-6606.

Undoubtedly, a favourite recipe is the one for Inclusion Soup:

Take 1 group of incredible young adults with challenges. Mix generously and often with:
1 cup of kindness
3 tbsp. of tolerance
6 tbsp. of warmth
1/4 cup of sensitivity
4 cups of humour
1 cup of education
5 tbsp. of respect
1 caring community

DANI offers the following recipes:

TOMATO AND BREAD SOUP – PAPPA AL POMODORO

Submitted by Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The Canadian Jewish News

1/2 cup olive oil
1 large yellow onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
2 28-oz. cans Italian plum tomatoes, chopped
3 cups diced bread, crusts removed (stale or dried bread works best)
4 cups pareve chicken stock or water
1/2 cup dry red wine
1 cup chopped fresh basil leaves
1 tbsp. kosher salt
1 1/2 tsp. freshly ground pepper
grated Parmesan cheese

Heat olive oil over a medium-high flame until hot but not smoking. Add onion and garlic and sauté for a few minutes until onion is translucent. Add chopped tomatoes and their juices and bring to a boil. Reduce to a simmer and let cook until the tomatoes begin to soften and break down, about five minutes. Add the stale bread chunks, red wine and stock or water.

Continue simmering until all the bread has absorbed as much liquid as possible, then break up bread pieces with spoon or whisk. Add the basil. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Let the soup continue simmering for 10 minutes, then serve immediately in warmed soup bowls. Garnish to taste with grated Parmesan cheese.

Sweet food memories for a sweet new year

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Each year, the High Holidays bring back special food memories of treasured times spent around the holiday table with family and friends, welcoming in the Jewish New Year. Apples and honey are two of the special symbols that are associated with Rosh Hashanah. For me, they bring back memories of my mother's scrumptious apple cake, packed with slices of cinnamon-laced apples between two layers of dough, her Pyrex-filled casserole crammed with carrot tzimmes consisting of round coins of carrots cut by hand and sweetened with honey, and her wonderful high and moist honey cake that she always made for yontif.

My Baba Masha once brought us a slab of honey cake that she bought at the bakery. She presented it to my mother, declaring in Yiddish that it was "azoi tyer" (so expensive). My mother replied, "Of course it's expensive because it's very heavy and you are paying for it by its weight. It's definitely not like my honey cake, which is as light as a feather!"

Each family has their own special food memories and traditions. The following ones have been shared with me by my "pan pals" – those special people who have shared their love of food and family with me. Enjoy!

This year, my cousin Carol Teichman is expecting 35 people for their Rosh Hashanah dinner, so instead of having it in her Thornhill home, a new tradition will begin and the family dinner will be catered at the golf club where her sister Arlene is a member. In the past, Carol has had up to 30 people around her table but now there's not enough room.

"If this doesn't work out, we can always go back to having it at home. The meal won't be home-made this year, but it's not always about the food. What's most important is that everyone should be together."

Some of the favourite family yom tov recipes that she usually makes are chicken soup (recipe follows), roast brisket, and crispy potato kugel (she uses my recipe from my food processor cookbook).

Carol says, "To your sweet and sour meatball recipe that features ginger ale and ketchup [Second Helpings], I always add a can of pureed beets. I sometimes add the juice, but not always. Jay's mother, Ferne Teichman, who is a fantastic cook, got the idea from her late mother, Raynor Kay, who was a great cook as well as a great baba. My chicken soup recipe seems to be a conglomeration of your recipe, my children's grandmother and my mother's recipes."

CAROL TEICHMAN'S CHICKEN SOUP FOR A CROWD

Clean about 6 quarter legs and lots of backs (or use 2 large chickens), and add enough water to stock pot to just cover all the chicken. I put in an onion (I remove it after 20 minutes but you can leave it in.) Boil and skim, then add 6 or 7 cloves of garlic, 6 large carrots peeled, quartered lengthwise and cut into 2 to 3 in. pieces, 5 or 6 stalks of celery, 1 large bunch of parsley root (I wrap it with the greens in cheesecloth along with 3/4 of a bunch of dill). I squeeze the juices of the cheesecloth into the soup for added flavour.

Add about 3 tbsp. of salt and about a tsp. or more of white pepper. If it doesn't have the richness I look for, I add some kosher chicken soup base. Let it simmer for about an hour and then the chore of separating everything begins. In addition to matzah balls, they love kreplach and tiny noodles. The biggest challenge is to get the soup delivered hot to all 30 participants at once!"

And speaking of chicken soup, Sharon Lebewohl was born with a soup spoon in her mouth! She grew up in the deli business, working at the Second Avenue Deli in New York City, where she learned her father's recipes first hand. Since her father's death in 1996, Sharon has worked with his brother, Jack, to oversee the deli's daily operations and to ensure that her father's spirit is kept alive there. The following recipe comes from The 2nd Avenue Deli Cookbook: Recipes and Memories from Abe Lebewohl's Legendary Kitchen. It's an excellent dish to serve for Rosh Hashanah, which begins on Shabbat this year. Enjoy...

ROAST CHICKEN WITH CHALLAH-APPLE STUFFING

Among religious Jews, roast chicken has always been a frequent Friday night entrée, because it can be left warming in the oven at a low temperature while Sabbath candles are lit, Kiddush is recited and the challah is blessed. Stuffing the chicken makes for a more festive meal. This is an especially yummy stuffing. The chickens need to be marinated in spices for at least a day in advance of cooking, so plan ahead.

Apple crown cake is fit for a king or queen?

4 tbsp. onion powder
4 tbsp. garlic powder
4 tbsp. paprika
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper

Stuffing:
4 tbsp. corn oil
2 cups chopped onion
1 cup celery, chopped into 1/2-in. pieces
2 McIntosh apples, peeled, cored, and cut into 3/4-in. pieces, 1/4-in. thick
10 cups challah bread (when cubed)
1 tbsp. schmaltz (optional)
2 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. poultry seasoning
3/4 cup pecan halves
1 tsp salt

Wash the chickens thoroughly in cold water and clean out their cavities. In a bowl, combine onion powder, garlic powder, paprika, salt and pepper. Mix thoroughly. Dredge the chickens (outside only) in this mixture, making sure all parts are well covered. Place in a dish covered with aluminum foil, and refrigerate overnight.

Preheat oven to 375. Heat 2 tbsp. of the corn oil in a large skillet, and sauté onions until brown. Remove with a slotted spoon to a large bowl. Sauté celery for a few minutes (it doesn't get very brown) and remove with a slotted spoon to the bowl with the onions. Add 1 tbsp. corn oil to the skillet, and sauté apples until lightly browned, adding the raisins when almost finished and browning for 1 more minute. Remove with a slotted spoon to the bowl with the onions and celery. Finally, add remaining 1 tbsp. corn oil to skillet (or a bit more if needed), brown the mushrooms, and remove with a slotted spoon to the same bowl.

Cut the challah into 3/4-in. cubes, place them in a colander, and moisten with water by sprinkling a bit at a time and tossing. Do not soak. Press out excess water, and transfer to the bowl with sautéed ingredients. Add schmaltz, eggs, poultry seasoning, pecans, and salt. Mix very thoroughly (use your hands).

Stuff the mixture into the cavities of the chickens; and tie their legs together with string. (You can further truss with skewers if you have them, but it isn't strictly necessary.)

Place in a baking pan with 1 in. of water. Bake, breast up, for 1 hour and 20 minutes (or until the chickens are nicely browned and the legs move easily up and down). Baste every 20 minutes with pan juices.

Place extra stuffing in a separate baking dish, and bake it along with chickens (for 1 hour only), spooning pan juices on it every 20 minutes (when you're basting the chickens) to keep it moist. Before serving, combine stuffing cooked outside the chickens with stuffing cooked inside them, add remainder of pan juices, adjust salt to taste, mix thoroughly, and warm briefly on stove if necessary.

Note: Use a deep dish – rather than a large, shallow one – bake extra stuffing. The outside will form a delicious crust, but you don't want too much crust in relation to stuffing.

This scrumptious apple cake recipe has been adapted from For the Love of Baking written by the late Lillian Kaplun, a well known Toronto culinary icon. It is a moist, luscious cake to serve for the New Year and is sure to be the crowning glory of your festive holiday table.

Nita Wexler of Toronto, who shared this holiday favourite with me from her recipe files, told me that it can be made with margarine to keep it pareve.

Nita says, "My family loves my Apple Crown Cake and asks me to make it for dessert every Rosh Hashanah. My late father, who passed away just a few months ago, used to kibbitz and say he felt like a king when he ate it."

NITA WEXLER'S FAVOURITE APPLE CROWN CAKE

Part 1
1/2 cup butter (or margarine)
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1 3/4 cups all purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
8 spy apples
cinnamon

Melt butter and let cool. Pour into a large bowl and add sugar gradually, beating well. Add eggs, one at a time, mixing thoroughly.

Combine flour and baking powder and stir into butter mixture, beating well. Spread mixture on bottom of a 10 in. ungreased spring-form pan.

Pare, core and cut apples into 1/8ths and stand the slices vertically in the batter, starting at the edge and working towards the centre until the batter is completely covered with apples.

Sprinkle with cinnamon and bake at 350 for 1 hour. Apples should be tender but still hold their shape.

Part 2
1/2 cup buttera
3/4 cup sugar
2 eggs

Cream butter and add sugar gradually. Beat well. Add eggs, one at a time and beat until custard consistency.

Pour custard over the baked cake and bake at 325 for another 30 minutes or until custard is set and lightly browned. Remove cake from spring form and serve warm or cold. Yield: 12 to 15 servings.

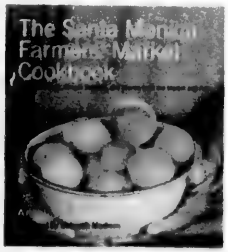
Fresh apples: the sweet bounty of the fall season

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Stroll through the farmers' market, and you feel fall approaching. As we say goodbye to summer's heat, those achingly sweet, soft, dribble-down-your-chin melons, peaches and plums give way to fall's bounty of apples, cool and crisp as an autumn day.

Dipping apple slices in honey, Jews the world over begin the festive meal of Rosh Hashanah, as we ask God to renew us for a good and sweet new year. But why do we eat apples for the Jewish New Year?

Some rabbis contend that when Jacob disguised himself as Esau in order to trick his father, Isaac, into blessing him as the first-born, Isaac – who was blind – noticed a sweet smell emanating from Jacob. Isaac likened the smell to a field blessed by God, which later commentators took to be an apple field. Because this incident is said to have occurred on Rosh Hashanah, the apple became an appropriate choice for the holiday.



Others cite Song of Songs 8:5, in which Solomon refers to romantic love – and by analogy, God's love for the Jewish People – in this way: "Beneath the apple tree I aroused your love." On Rosh Hashanah, the apple is the reminder of this special bond.

Whatever the biblical explanation, it is no coincidence that the apple, which comes to season in the fall, holds a central place in this fall celebration.

Apples belong to the rose family of plants. Approximately 10,000 different varieties grow in the world. With so many varieties to choose from, which apples make the best dippers?

"Braeburns would be lovely," suggested Amelia Saltsman, author of The Santa Monica Farmers' Market Cookbook (Blenheim Press). "I like a little bit of contrast with my honey, and Braeburns are sweet-tart."

For a sweeter choice, try Galas or Fujis, she said, but beware. "We see Fujis year round in the supermarket because they come from all over the world. The big surprise is when you buy freshly harvested apples that haven't been sitting around in storage – even varieties like gala can get kind of mealy when stored too long – they are crisp and honeyed and juicy."

Apples keep well, but not as long as you might think, she added, and are better stored in the refrigerator than sitting for a long time on the counter.

"When you get freshly harvested apples, those that have not been long stored, they have a better texture and flavour. Even varieties that we take for granted like Red Delicious can be, well, delicious."

While apples keep in storage, they may not do so at their prime, she cautioned. "That's why they've always been kept in bushel baskets in the root cellar. Use fresh, crisp, perfect apples in ways that showcase them. When you get to the end of the bushel, make applesauce. When you've got them in perfect condition, celebrate them."

For baked apples, Saltsman suggests Winesaps, Spitzenbergs, Arkansas Blacks and, of course, Rome Beauties, although the latter are not that common in farmers' markets, she said. "You want an almost melting flesh when you bake it as opposed to its retaining its shape. A Northern Spy apple would be wonderful too."

Use apples for a variety of desserts

For baking pies and tarts, Saltsman recommends Pink Pearls, Spitzenbergs, Pippins, and Empires – Winesaps and Golden Russets for a tarter flavour – although this list is far from exclusive. "Mix any of those with an apple that holds its shape and you have the best of both worlds," she said.

Holiday meals deserve a towering beauty, and Rougemont Apple Pastry Cake from Marcy Goldman's A Passion for Baking (Oxmoor House) is a showstopper.

Rougemont, French for "red mountain," refers to the apple region outside Goldman's home in Montreal. "It is known mostly for McIntosh and Cortland apples," she said. "For pastries I always use a combination of sweet and tart apples, like Golden Delicious with McIntosh and Cortland – that is perfect. And avoid Granny Smith for baking. They are too hard, tart and watery."

For baking, dipping or just plain eating – on holidays or any day – you'll find the best-flavoured produce at your farmers' market.

"Even the very ordinary things sing with great flavour, the simplest things – carrots, potatoes, eggplant, tomatoes and, yes, apples," Saltsman said. "It makes all the difference in the world."

CINNAMONY BAKED APPLES

Adapted from The Silver Palate Cookbook: 25th Anniversary Edition by Julee Rosso and Sheila Lukins

2 cups water
2 1/4 cups brown sugar
1 1/2 tbsp. ground cinnamon
1 1/2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
6 medium-large tart baking apples, washed (do not peel)
3/4 cup raisins
1/2 cup shelled pecans, chopped
1 tbsp. grated lemon zest
3 tbsp. Calvados or applejack
3 tbsp. unsalted butter or nondairy margarine

Preheat oven to 375. Mix water, 3/4 cup of the brown sugar, 1/2 tbsp. of the cinnamon and the lemon juice in a saucepan. Bring to a boil and cook for 3 minutes. Remove syrup from heat and reserve.

Remove apple cores, but do not cut all the way through the bottoms.In a bowl, mix remaining 1-1/2 cups brown sugar, raisins, pecans, lemon zest and remaining 1 tablespoon cinnamon. Fill each apple to within 1/4 in. of the top. Pour 1 teaspoon Calvados over filling in each apple and top with 1/2 tablespoon butter.

Transfer apples to a 9 x 13-in. baking dish and pour syrup over apples. Sprinkle remaining tablespoon of Calvados into syrup.

Bake apples until tender, basting occasionally with syrup in pan, 1 hour.

When apples are done, transfer them with a slotted spoon to a serving dish. Pour syrup from pan into a small saucepan, bring to a boil and cook until slightly reduced, about 5 minutes. Cool slightly, pour a tablespoon of syrup over each apple and serve remaining syrup on the side. Yield: 6 servings

ELLEN'S APPLE TART

Adapted from The Silver Palate Cookbook: 25th Anniversary Edition

For poaching the apples:
1 1/2 cups sugar
piece of a cinnamon stick
6 whole cloves
1/2 vanilla bean
zest of 1 lemon, cut into fine julienne
4 medium-to-large tart cooking apples, peeled, cored, and halved

For the tart:
3/4 cup sugar
3 tbsp.water
2 tbsp. unsalted butter or nondairy margarine
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
2 tbsp. Calvados or applejack
1 pound puff pastry

Poach the apples: Combine sugar, cinnamon stick, cloves, vanilla bean and lemon zest in 1 quart of water. Simmer 10 minutes.

Add apple halves. Bring syrup back to a simmer and cook gently until apples are tender but still slightly firm. Do not overcook!

Transfer apples to a strainer set over a bowl and allow them to cool completely.

To prepare the tart: Pour sugar and water into a 10-in. cast-iron frying pan and stir to combine. Set over medium heat and cook, watching carefully, until sugar syrup reaches a golden brown. Remove immediately from heat and set pan on a cool surface. Caramelized sugar will harden.

Place 1 apple half, rounded side down, on the caramelized sugar in the centre of the pan. Surround with 6 of the remaining halves, placing them close together. Slice last half into 6 slices and place them in the spaces between apples in the ring, with their rounded edges outward.

Melt butter in a saucepan. Whisk in lemon juice, nutmeg and Calvados, and drizzle over apples.

Preheat oven to 425. Roll out puff pastry to 1/4-in. thickness, and cut out a round 12 inches in diameter.

Sweet cake for a sweet year ahead

Place over the apples and roll edges of pastry back 1 inch all around to give edges a finished look.

Place tart in oven (make sure it has reached 425; preheating is very important to ensure puff pastry rises). Bake until pastry is deep golden brown and syrup is bubbling around edges, 30 to 35 minutes. If pastry browns too quickly, cover with a piece of aluminum foil.

When tart is done, remove from oven and let sit 15 minutes. Invert onto a serving platter. Serve warm or at room temperature. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

ROUGEMONT APPLE PASTRY CAKE

From A Passion for Baking by Marcy Goldman

For the pastry crust: (see notes)
2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tbsp.sugar
1/2 tsp. salt
3/4 cup unsalted butter, cut into chunks
4 to 6 tbsp. ice water or half-and-half

For the apple filling:
10 to 12 large apples, cored, peeled, and cut into 1/4-in. slices
1/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins, plumped and dried (see notes)
1 tbsp. lemon juice

For the Vanilla Sauce:
1/2 cup unsalted butter, melted
1 cup sugar
2 tsp.pure vanilla extract
4 large eggs
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Finishing touches:
confectioners' sugar
apricot jam, warmed

Note: Store-bought refrigerated or frozen pie dough may be substituted for the pastry crust.

To plump and dry raisins, cover them with very hot water and let stand 5 to 10 minutes. Then drain and pat dry with paper towels before using in any recipe.

Line a baking sheet with parchment paper. Brush bottom and sides of a 10-inch springform pan with melted butter and place on baking sheet.

For pastry crust, place flour, sugar, and salt in a food processor. Add butter and pulse to make a grainy mixture. Add water and pulse to make a shaggy dough (before it can be made into a ball). On a lightly floured work surface, gather dough together, kneading a few moments to make a smooth dough. Wrap and chill dough at least 1 hour before rolling out.

Meanwhile, for apple filling, toss apples with sugar, cornstarch, cinnamon, raisins and lemon juice.

Preheat oven to 350. Roll or press out dough evenly and fit on bottom and sides of prepared pan. (Dough should be between 1/8 and 1/4 in. thick.) Fill with apple filling, pressing gently. For final layer of apples, arrange apples in concentric circles. Apples should come to top of pan. If they don't, prepare more to fill out the pan, tossing with 2 tbsp. sugar and a touch of cinnamon. Cover pan lightly with aluminum foil.

Bake cake 60 to 75 minutes or until apples are soft, removing foil after 20 minutes. The top apples might seem dry and browned around their edges, but interior apples should begin to feel soft – use a skewer to test apples.

For vanilla sauce, in a small bowl, blend melted butter, sugar, vanilla, eggs, flour and cinnamon. Pour this over hot pastry cake, trying to get sauce to drip into crevices. Bake another 20 minutes. Cool on a wire rack.

Refrigerate pastry cake at least 6 hours, or preferably overnight. Dust with confectioners sugar or brush with warmed apricot jam before serving. Yield: 12 to 16 servings.

Jewish Mamas' classics!

By DENISE PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Cooking and good food have been as central to Jewish life as the synagogue because of their role in promoting family values. The Jewish calendar is studded with a glorious variety of festivals and holidays. Some of them are serious occasions; others are more fun. But they all have one thing in common: a celebratory shared meal with a signature dish chosen for its religious connections. And behind each one is a Jewish Mama, that legendary combination of a caring mother capable of creating classic, delicious meals at a moment's notice on a regular, almost daily basis.

Ask people for their view on a classic Jewish recipe, and they are likely to include chicken soup, chopped liver, gefilte fish and/or lockshen pudding. Where have these Jewish Mamas' classics come from? What is their heritage and link to the religion?

History and geography have been a huge influence on Jewish cooking. Over the past thousand years, Jews have settled in every corner of the globe and cooked local dishes, adapting them to suit Jewish dietary laws of kashrut. After living in one place, Jews may have moved on by choice or through forced exile or decree, but each time, they have taken with them the style of cooking and recipes of their adopted homelands.

Most western European Jews are Ashkenazi – coming from Poland, Russia and Austria – and we continue to cook foods associated with these cultures such as soups, stews, stuffed vegetables and starchy, sugary warming dishes good for comfort during the Siberian winter months. Particular soup classics include borscht and barley soup made with ingredients that were both plentiful and cheap to buy when times were difficult and food was sparse.

"And thou shall teach them diligently to thy children and thou shall talk of them when you sit in your house and when you walk by the way..." appears to apply not only to the laws of the Torah, but also to what to eat. We are a nation of people that pass down our recipes from great-grandmothers to grandchildren. Jewish Mamas have always talked about how the food should be prepared – and often argued over whose recipe was the best.

For this reason, recipes have evolved with the addition of a little of this and a little of that to the extent that even a true Jewish Mamas' classic such as chicken soup does not have a definitive recipe. Each family will have their little secret ingredient. When I got married, I had fish ball training from my mother-in-law so that her traditional recipe would never be lost. And only recently, my mother bought me a new mincer so that the chopped liver would be the right texture. She said I could not be a true "Jewish Mama" without it!

My personal tip for chicken soup is to cut a whole onion in half and leave the skin on in the stock. This adds both colour and flavour. Also use carcass bones and giblets – not the boiling chickens as they have little flavour!

As time passes, maybe some of the original recipes that I have created over the years will become classics, but until then, you can read more about the history of Jewish cooking and choose from over 100 classic recipes in my latest book, The Jewish Mama's Kitchen, published by Octopus books (www.jewishcookery.com)

MUSHROOM BARLEY SOUP

This is a really tasty soup that has more variations than you can begin to imagine. It can be frozen and can be made pareve. This recipe is my version of a classic Polish soup that has been updated with the addition of dried porcini mushrooms and an addition of some sweet wine or sherry. It makes a pleasant change to the traditional chicken soup for a family Rosh Hashanah gathering. Adding the giblets subtly incorporates natural flavour without salt! It is a nutritious, filling soup to keep for cold winters when only the best warming broth will do!

3 cups mushrooms – sliced
1/2 cup dried porcini – soaked in a little hot water
4 chicken wings, 2 turkey or chicken necks and heart – mix of giblets
2 onions – peeled and roughly chopped
2 potatoes – peeled and cut into cubes
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 carrots – peeled and shredded
3 stalks celery – roughly chopped
1 cup barley – soaked for 1 hour in hot water
2 cloves garlic – peeled and finely chopped
12 cups water plus 3 tablespoons vegetable or chicken stock or 2 cubes
2 tbsp. sherry or sweet wine salt and freshly ground black pepper – to taste
sprigs of parsley for garnish (optional)

Heat the vegetable oil in a deep skillet. Sauté the onions, garlic, potatoes and celery for 5 minutes. Add the giblets, chicken or vegetable stock and barley. Bring to a boil and simmer for 30 minutes.

Add the mushrooms, carrots and porcini mushrooms with the soaking liquid. Continue to simmer for a further 30 minutes. Remove the giblets. Add the sherry or wine. Season with salt and freshly ground black pepper.

To serve the stylish way, garnish with sprigs of parsley.

Preparation Time: 15 minutes plus 1 hour to soak barley. Cooking Time: 1 hour and 5 minutes. Serves 8-10 people.

Holiday Food Ideas

Think outside the box for your holiday meal

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of the toughest tasks during the High Holidays is to come up with meals that are not the same old gefilte fish appetizer and brisket and roast chicken entrees. While tradition has its place sometimes you just need to think outside the recipe box and imagine what you might like to serve to start out a special meal.

This year, for a first course let's try lettuce wraps. Delicious, simple, easy to make ahead of time, really beautiful to see and most importantly, they're different.

CHICKEN LETTUCE WRAPS

This recipe is from Todd Wilbur and Top Secret Recipes

3 tbsp. oil
2 boneless skinless chicken breasts
1 cup water chestnuts
2/3 cup mushrooms
3 tbsp. chopped onions
1 tsp. minced garlic
4-5 leaves iceberg lettuce

Special Sauce
1/4 cup sugar
1/2 cup water
2 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. rice wine vinegar
2 tbsp. ketchup
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/8 tsp. sesame oil
1 tbsp. hot mustard
2 tsp. water
1-2 tsp. garlic and red chili paste

Stir Fry Sauce
2 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. rice wine vinegar

Make the special sauce by dissolving the sugar in water in a small bowl. Add soy sauce, rice wine vinegar, ketchup, lemon juice and sesame oil.

Mix well and refrigerate this sauce until you're ready to serve. Combine the hot water with the hot mustard and set this aside as well. Eventually add your desired measurement of mustard and garlic chili sauce to the special sauce mixture to pour over the wraps.

Bring oil to high heat in a wok or large frying pan. Sauté chicken breasts for 4 to 5 minutes per side or until done. Remove chicken from the pan and cool. Keep oil in the pan, keep hot. As chicken cools, mince water chestnuts and mushrooms to about the size of small peas. Prepare the stir fry sauce by mixing the soy sauce, brown sugar, and rice vinegar together in a small bowl. When chicken is cool, mince. With the pan still on high heat, add another tbsp. of vegetable oil. Add chicken, garlic, onions, water chestnuts and mushrooms to the pan. Add the stir fry sauce to the pan and saute the mixture for a couple minutes then serve it in the lettuce "cups". Top with "Special Sauce". Makes 4 appetizer servings. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

VEGETARIAN LETTUCE WRAPS

1 head iceberg lettuce
1 tbsp. minced garlic
1 tbsp. grated ginger
1 red chili – deseeded and finely chopped
1 tbsp. chopped onion or 2 small shallots diced
1/2 cup extra firm tofu cut into thin slices
1/2 cup grated carrot
1/2 cup shredded cabbage
4 green onions sliced thin
2 cups bean sprouts
2 tbsp. lime juice
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1/2 cup chopped dry roasted peanuts, optional
2 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 cup fresh basil, chopped

Cut off stem of iceberg lettuce, separate the leaves and place in a bowl of ice cubes so that they become cold and crisp. Heat oil in a wok or a large frying pan.

Add garlic, ginger, red chilies and shallots and sauté until translucent. Add the tofu, carrot, cabbage and spring onion and stir fry for a couple of minutes.

Add the lime juice and soy sauce. Add the bean sprouts and stir fry for a minute and remove from heat. Take a whole lettuce leaf and place 2 or 3 tbsp. of filling in the centre. Top with fresh basil. Add roasted peanuts (optional) Make into a wrap and enjoy.

Start your meal with lettuce wraps

2 tbsp. teriyaki sauce
1 tsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. chili paste
1/4 tsp. hot chili oil
1/4 tsp. sesame oil
iceberg lettuce leaves, crisped in ice water, drained
2 cups shredded cabbage
2 cups cooked rice
1/2 cup green onions, sliced

In a skillet over medium high heat sauté ground beef and garlic, remove from heat, add teriyaki sauce, soy sauce, chili paste, hot chili oil and sesame oil, taste for seasoning. Can be made ahead, cooled, covered and refrigerated.

When ready to serve reheat the mixture, put drained lettuce leaves on a serving platter, cabbage in a bowl with serving tongs, rice in a bowl, and onions in another small bowl. Allow each person to make their own wrap and add more hot seasoning according to their taste. Serve with sliced fresh tomatoes and cucumbers. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

KOREAN BEEF LETTUCE WRAPS

Partially freeze the beef to make slicing thinly easier (to make it really simple, get your butcher to slice it for you) making certain to squeeze out any moisture in the beef before starting this recipe. These are delicious and simple to make.

1/2 cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. sesame oil
1 tbsp. Asian chili sauce (optional or to taste, add in for extra heat, or use dried chili peppers)
7 green onions, finely chopped
2 tbsp. minced garlic
2 tbsp. minced fresh ginger
6 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds
2 lb. steaks (cut across the grain into very thin slices, no more than 1/8-in. thick)
2 tbsp. oil
chopped green onion, for sprinkling
1 large lettuce leaf (or use any soft lettuce leaves such as butter lettuce) cooked white rice

In a bowl stir together soy sauce, sugar, sesame oil, green onions, garlic, ginger and 4 tbsp.sesame seeds; mix until the sugar is dissolved.

Add in the steak and toss to coat; marinade 20 minutes at room temperature. Heat oil in a large skillet over high heat until just smoking, then add in the steak slices in one layer, saute the slices turning occasionally until browned and cooked through (this should take about 4 to 5 minutes, you will most likely have to cook the beef in batches, depending on how large your skillet is). Transfer to a platter and sprinkle with green onions and remaining 2 tbsp. sesame seeds. Serve the lettuce leaves on the side and roll the beef in the leaves. Serve with cooked rice. Makes 6 to 8 appetizer servings.

Buying a suit – for men

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Every man needs at least one high quality suit hanging in his wardrobe. A suit is one of the most basic items for men whether it is for work or for a special occasion. And unlike a woman's collection of clothing, a few suits can likely last a man for several years; especially if he takes good care of them.

One website suggests the following tips for lengthening the life of a man's suit: dry clean it only a few times a year or as needed; avoid loading the pockets with items that will put a strain on the seams; hang your suit on a wooden hanger; and store it in a bag to protect it.

When in the market for a new suit, one thing to consider is the stitching on the garment. It should be neat and firm as it is the foundation for holding the whole thing together and is also a hallmark of quality in good tailoring and design. Also make sure that the buttons and button holes are properly placed and lined up; that the collar sits snugly around your neck with no gaps, and that the lapels fall flat on the chest.

If you are a suit wearer, you might want your wardrobe to have outfits for the summer season in light weight fabrics and in an assortment of lighter colours such as taupe, light grey or beige; as well as suits for the fall and winter in darker shades and perhaps heavier fabrics. If you rarely have the occasion to wear a suit, it is important to choose an all purpose, timeless classic design in navy, grey or black, that can be worn for any event including interviews and weddings.

Pairing the pants and jacket with different shirts and ties, or adding a vest, or wearing a sweater with the pants, or sporting a turtle neck jersey with the suit can give a man any number of different looks. One male shopper notes that he shops for a new suit with the knowledge of what he has in his closet that he can mix and match to create new combinations for events requiring a suit.

The literature notes that a well fitting suit helps a man project confidence and power in business and stylish masculinity for other occasions; and the accessories he chooses to complement his outfit expresses his personality. One important tip when in the market for a new suit is to think about the reason for buying it. For example, if you are looking for an outfit for that job interview, consider a mid grey, dark grey or navy blue suit if you are going after a management position; a striped fabric is also a good choice.

There are numerous men's stores offering off-the-rack suits and usually the sales people are knowledgeable and can give fashion advice on fabrics, colours and trends of suit styles.

"But never buy a suit when there is a two for one or a half off the second one when the first one is purchased," says one male shopper, who adds that he hates pushy salespeople, "as you usually end up with two suits you rarely wear that don't fit right, when in reality you only needed the one suit and would have happily paid more for the one that would have fit properly and would have looked great."

Although this man usually will only buy a new outfit for a special occasion, he says he likes his suits slick and slim fitting, not hanging off his body like a tent. He wants to look like the models depicted in magazines, à la James Bond, and adds that it is sometimes hard to get the look he wants from off the rack garments – although some men's boutiques do offer alterations – and on occasion has chosen to have tailor made suits.

He admits that he will sometimes ask for advice and other's opinions, but ultimately the final purchase is his decision as he has to wear the outfit and feel good in it and want to wear it again and again.

Fall fashion hues complement autumn foliage

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Canadians can visit any urban park or rural forest this fall to feast their eyes on Mother Nature's flair for colour. For centuries, designers have emulated nature's hues in furnishing wardrobes, dwellings and accessories. Fall foliage provides the final barrage of colourful hues before we face barren branches and blasts of cold air.

With regard to colour, fashionistas tend to follow fall foliage featuring different variations of nature's colour wheel. Since the fashion industry plans everything well ahead, the U.S. Pantone Colour Institute announced its fall fashion pantone at New York Fashion Week several months ago.

The institute is recognized as the global authority on colour and provider of professional colour standards for design industries.

"The fall 2009 palette is more unique and thoughtful than the typical autumnal hues of years past," said Leatrice Eiseman, executive director of the Pantone Colour Institute and head of the Eiseman Center for Colour Information and Training.

Red and purple are most popular colours this fall

The institute introduced a broad spectrum of colours geared to suit different tastes, skin tones and attire.

Fashion pundits recognize the importance of providing consumers with colours that match and mix with what's new as well as last fall's finds. Although fashion designers hold different views, they are all aware of the economic downturn.

Fortunately, the 2009 colour chart allows for flexibility in fashion. The kaleidoscope provides plenty of cheerful hues to please pragmatic fashion-conscious individuals.

According to Tim Gunn, chief creative officer at Liz Claiborne Inc., and mentor on Bravo's Project Runway, adding colour is a keen and budget-conscious way to update a wardrobe and it can be mentally uplifting.

Gunn believes in acquiring high quality fabrics to enjoy years of fine wear from colourful items.

Gunn also cautions consumers from buying something just because it appealed to them in the shop window or on the hanger. Colour has to suit the individual's skin-tone and hair colour, he stresses. Therefore, shoppers should try on the garment before heading to the cash register.

Nina Garcia, another Project Runway judge and fashion director of Marie Claire, also lent her expertise to Pantone's information gallery.

She is convinced consumers can't go wrong with classic colours. She says they look expensive and mix well.

For example, earth tones in brown and beige offer countless wardrobe options. Garcia advises consumers to choose colours in the same tonal palette because it will make the individual appear slimmer, more sophisticated and elegant.

The top 10 colours for fall 2009 are American Beauty, Purple Heart, Honey Yellow, Iron, Burnt Sienna, Nomad, Rapture Rose, Warm Olive, Majolica Blue and Crème Brûlée.

American Beauty, a true red, flatters most skin tones and is deemed a feel-good colour and Purple Heart is an endearing colour that is often co-ordinated with American Beauty.

Honey Yellow is a rich, warm, subdued golden colour tone. Pantone suggests combining Honey Yellow with Purple Heart or Burnt Sienna and Iron. The latter is a neutral shade and designers hail it as the "new black" because it goes with everything.

Burnt Sienna, a deepened earthy variation of orange, is equated with an "autumn sunset."

Fashion merchandisers showcase it with Rapture Rose and Nomad. The latter is a neutral grey/beige blend that is marvelous for suits, skirts and slacks because it mixes with blouses and sweaters in every colour.

Rapture Rose captures the vibrancy of fuchsia and the softness of baby pink. Trendsetters consider it a gem for accessorizing.

Warm Olive is yellowish/green and Majolica Blue is a variation of teal blue. Lighter than navy, darker than powder blue and softer than deep blue, it's attractive and flattering. Crème Brûlée, like Nomad and Iron, are sure bets for big-name items, such as career and cocktail suits, because the colours don't clash with existing accessories.

Fashion savvy for the mature woman

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLAT
Special to The CJN

On a recent TV fashion show I heard the expression "fashion is an art form," and in a way, we are all artists and our bodies are our canvasses. Each time we decide what to wear and how to accessorize with adornments such as scarves, jewelry and shoes, we are creating a work of art.

What I also learned from that show is that models are muses for clothing designers and it is they who inspire the changes we see in fashion.

However, most of the fashion magazines on the stands are aimed at a younger crowd – for the teen, the young mother, the working woman – as if women in their more mature years are no longer interested in fashion.

Some people believe that once you hit a certain age you should change your style of dress and give up your favourite colours and clothing. This just is not so. After all, the age-old expression that clothes make the man/woman holds true no matter what your age.

Although we do not want to dress like today's teens, we do not need to forget all about fashion.

Many websites offer fashion tips for seniors so that we can continue to look current and stylish. We may not be able to wear mini skirts any more (if indeed we ever were), or short smocks with leggings sported by so many young, slim women, but we can still choose to wear what makes us comfortable and feel great about ourselves.

A suggestion to consider the next time you shop for a new outfit, or perhaps browse through what is already in your wardrobe is to forget about fads.

Choose clothing based on ease and have features like buttons that are easy to fasten. Wear comfortable shoes with heels that are high enough to add elegance, but short enough so as not to cause a fall.

Carry a light jacket or sweater for those times when you might feel chilly – sweaters are for every age group and can be co-ordinated with your outfit.

If you have a particular style – classic, modern, or eclectic – dress according to what you like, even if it is not trendy or "in fashion;" and don't forget a hat, especially on sunny days when it is important to protect your skin.

Hats also have a role in fashion. You can choose from any number of designs, from brimmed to a small cloche or beret, to complement your outfit.

Also, remember to accessorize wisely with a scarf around your shoulders, held with a large pin, or the always popular strand of pearls, but do not go overboard with jewelry.

Less is still better and the trend of fashion jewelry with chunky stone necklaces is great for all ages.

Above all, be yourself. You don't have to give up the bold, dramatic colours you used to wear.

Continue to do so as this represents your personality and who you are. Age is just a number; wear what makes you feel good about yourself.

Fall fashion sizzles for all girls

News Canada

The lazy days of summer are about to come to an end, signaling the start of a new school year. This fall, add some of the season's hottest trends to your wardrobe affordably from Sears.

Boyfriend Cardigan: Nothing says fall fashion like a cozy cardigan. This fall, girls can add the boyfriend cardigan to their wardrobe to dress up simple skinny jeans or cords. Form fitted or relaxed fit cardigans with pocket detailing will be especially popular this fall.

Prints: Tiny floral prints, plaids and stripes are showing up on tunics, shirts, and skirts. Try a multi print tunic over skinny jeans or leggings. Another cute look is to add a plaid hat to your ensemble. Also look for dresses with tiny floral detailing.

The Vest: The vest is a nice way to add flair to any outfit. Fitted vests can go over any of the season's tunic style shirts and graphic t-shirts.

The Tunic: Everyone ismad for tunics. They look good on every body shape. Wear it loose, belted, tucked into jeans or over leggings.

Denim: Teen girls place denim high on their back-to-school shopping list. Simple slim cut denim is the style of choice.

Knitwear: Ponchos, sweater coats, belted and swing cardigans have found a permanent home in junior and teenage girl's closets. This fall, they're much more funky and fun and will keep girls warm on crisp fall days.

Fall Fashion

Where has the summer gone? Better yet, what happened to all the hot, sunny days that we used to have?

We may not have had a picture-perfect summer, but we did enjoy some outdoor activities. With that in mind, be sure to cleanse your face well every day, as the heat does take a toll on your skin. Make sure to moisturize day and night and exfoliating once a week wouldn't hurt. Continue to use your eye cream as well.

Say goodbye to the dewy looks of summer. This season is all about a matte finish on your face, and the look is porcelain without a bit of shine. For eyes, the best makeup colours are dark and bold. Purple is one of the best colours, as well as gold, bronze and metallic shades. Smoky eyes, with dark mascara and black eye shadow, are hotter and bolder than ever. Cheeks should look rosy, as if you were walking on a brisk chilly morning. For lips, the hottest shades this fall are bright red and shiny berry colours. For your nails, purple and metallic colours like gold and bronze are hot, hot, hot for this fall.

To complete your makeup and new fall wardrobe, make sure to add the new fall 2009 jewelry: big statement necklaces, chandelier earrings and bold bracelets.

And now that the days will begin to get cooler, go back to the gym, continue to do your daily workout, drink plenty of water, eat well and enjoy the prettiest time of year.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

CONCEALER AND FOUNDATION:

After applying your eye cream, begin to conceal the areas that need coverage. Concealer for dark circles should be hydrating and light in texture. High coverage concealers are better used for blemishes. Clarins Fragrance Group is proud to introduce the Platinum Mirror Collection, Regard Luminescent – Radiant Concealer by Thierry Mugler. Using the backside of the applicator, you can apply touches of concealer along the interior of the eye line. Using the front side, you can apply to the face for a perfect finish. With the tiredness removed, the face recovers the look of youth that it truly deserves.

Along with this amazing concealer, this collection also features a Fluid Luminous Foundation – Teint Luminescent. It is a liquid formula that is supple, creamy and luminous and builds coverage without a mask effect. Both of these products are exclusive to the Bay beginning at the end of September 2009.

Achieve an overall polished look with Lasting Finish Foundation, a re-energizing, mineral-enriched and oil-free formula that gives skin 16 hours of flawless and fresh-looking coverage. The Rimmel London Lasting Finish Foundations is available in 10 stay true shades.

Cover FX, the foundation authority, launches new Conceal FX Camouflage Concealer, an instant, flaw-erasing concealer cream with a lightweight, velvet finish. Perfect for seamlessly covering anything you want to hide, Conceal FX provides opaque, long-lasting, water-resistant coverage and can be used to instantly erase under-eye circles, redness, dark spots, sun damage, blemishes, tattoos, birthmarks, fatigue or skin trauma.

EYE MAKEUP AND BLUSH:

This fall, the eyes are the number one focal point as Estée Lauder brings you a new, limited life eye shadow collection. New Pure Color Eyeshadow Single-Matte and Metallic deliver saturated colour that is colour true, fade resistant and long-wearing. The matte collection offers soft, rich matte shades with no shimmer, in skin-loving colours ranging from light neutrals to deep inks. Pure Color Eye Shadow-Metallic is a true metallic formula that stays in place, leaving no glitter residue around the eyes, and it provides a dazzling effect of colour and texture. This amazing collection will be available for only a short time, beginning in October 2009.

This season, brighten your world and lift your spirits with refreshing shades of beauty. Pürminerals makeup is proud to present Pressed Mineral Shadows in two beautiful shades. To get the runway look, sweep Pressed Mineral Shadow in Chrome Cryolite all over the lid up to the brow bone. Then apply Burgundy Malachite into the crease of the eye and blend outward. Complete the look by lining your eyes with the Plum Quartz gel liner and lightly smudge the colour for that smoky finish.

Girls just want to have fun with Rimmel London's Colour Rush Mono Special Effects Eye Shadow. This silk pressed powder formula with an added layer of shimmer transforms the wild '80s colours into a modernized look. The shadow is available in six bright shades. Continue to make that '80s statement with Exaggerate Waterproof Eye Definer in Purple Shock. "Use the built-in sharpener to create defining lines or use the smudger feature to completely cover the lid with the bold colour," the manufacturer advises. Complete the '80s eyes with Sexy Curves Waterproof Mascara. The hourglass applicator adds volume with shorter bristles, while the longer ones curl and separate lashes.

Moroccanoil products.

If you are looking to spotlight the eyes, look no further. Thierry Mugler – Clarins Fragrance Group presents Ombre Stellaire – Mono Eye Shadow, a true metallic rock melted into a fine cream. This shadow is designed to create exciting eyelids that attract everyone's attention. Ombre Stellaire is available in two shades: mercury and golden bronze.

The glitter continues in this line with Cils Vinyle Mercury – Vinyl Gloss for Eyelashes. For the first time, eyelashes are ultra-brilliant and coated in a silvery vinyl sheath.

When you wear it, your eyelashes will flutter. This collection will be available in November 2009 exclusively at The Bay.

Revlon has a great history of setting trends in colour cosmetics and will continue to do so with its New Revlon Passion Fusion collection. The collection will introduce eight new limited edition shades for lip, eye and nail. ColorStay 12 Hour Eye Shadow Quad feels silky smooth, blends well and is fade proof. The rich, beautiful colour looks freshly applied for up to 12 hours. As eyes are one of the big statements for fall, cheeks remain natural. Revlon Illuminance All over Palette is used for eye, cheek and lip. This limited edition has a variety of colours, and the creamy texture glides on smoothly and lasts all day.

LIPS AND NAILS:

Choose a lipstick that both colours and cares. Introducing Rimmel London's Moisture Renew Lipstick. Vitamins A, C and E help to protect the lips and still maintain their condition over time so that they look and feel up to 60 per cent softer and smoother. As a result of this, the colour is clearly maximized and lipstick looks bold and vibrant.

Nails turn dark and dramatic this fall with selected shades from Opi's Colección de España. Powerful shades like cobalt blue and darkest emerald are the nail colours to wear. To keep fall manicures looking beautiful longer Suzi Weiss-Fischmann, Opi executive vice-president and artistic director recommends Opi ChipSkip Nail Lacquer Chip Preventor. Just apply one coat on dry nails before your colour, as this will help increase adhesion of colour and prevent chipping.

FRAGRANCES:

From fine jewelry to fine perfumery, Van Cleef & Arpels brings enchantment to the world of luxury fragrance with the new scent of Féerie. The richly faceted Féerie bottle is like a precious stone revealing all its beauty and mystery.

Lancôme offers every woman a joyously sensual fragrance in introducing Hypnôse Senses. The perfume veils skin in a delicate mist. Its charm is alluring, and its aura is deliciously mysterious.

Estée Lauder offers the new Private Collection Jasmine White Mosso. The vision of two Lauder women, Estée Lauder and her granddaughter Aerin Lauder, separated by a generation, merged into one to create this intoxicatingly fresh new fragrance. With its passionate yet elegant blend of modern and classic ingredients, the fragrance is a tribute to past and present, a genuine first in the history of fragrance and for the Estée Lauder brand.

This October, a variety of cosmetic companies will join in the battle to beat breast cancer by spreading awareness and raising funds for the cure. Be sure to check out all the wonderful products.

Enjoy the fall days that lie ahead and be sure to try these wonderful beauty tips we have shared here.

Comic provides closed captioning for the 'Hebrew-impaired'

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

It's rare to find a man that can pull off a Don Juanstein impersonation and convince a woman that her eyes sparkle like a yarzheit candle. For modern Orthodox comedian Elon Gold, it's just par for the course.

Gold, who refers to himself as "the Jewish Jerry Seinfeld," travels across North America with his unique brand of Semitic comedy. He recently debuted his newest standup act, Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish, at Montreal's Just for Laughs festival in July, emphasizing that he was extremely excited to be part of "Jews pour rire."

Gold's show, which played to sold-out audiences at Centaur Theatre, was the culmination of more than a decade's work.

"A wise friend once told me to joke about what I really care about," he explains. "And I really, really care about the Jews."

The 90-minute show is laced with hilarious observations about the tradition and surrounding culture. In Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish, Gold pokes fun at all things Yehudi, from modern Jewish stereotypes to ancient Passover customs.

"As a people, we're way too mad at bread," he jokes. "Why do we focus all our anger about slavery in Egypt on the fact that we couldn't have a sandwich on our way out?"

At one point in the show, Gold even brings out a blue-and-white Jewish version of Santa Claus, who instructs his fellow Jews to "be happy," but not "so happy they forget about the pogroms."

'Poor man's Jackie Mason' brings new act to Just for Laughs'

Elon Gold, who was in Montreal earlier this summer for the Just for Laughs festival, considers himself "the Jewish Jerry Seinfeld."

Very Jewish indeed. Gold's latest act comes with an apt warning that some material "may not be suitable for gentiles," and he even provides closed captioning for the "Hebrew-impaired." Most of his material hinges heavily on a certain familiarity with the Jewish tradition. Without it, his impressions of Gilbert Gottfried as Moses or Gene Wilder as Abraham might seem just a little bit out of place.

Of course, Gold himself is no stranger to the Jewish tradition. The New York native jokes that he grew up in a family so religious that his grandparents had to keep two toilets: one for milk and one for meat.

Today, he describes himself as a "modern Orthodox" Jew, joking that by "modern," he means "not so."

"I do practise Judaism, though," says Gold, "because practice makes perfect."

Although he keeps Shabbat and eats kosher, he's careful about how he describes his religious affiliation.

"I like to say I'm observant, not religious, because it takes the pressure off. If you say you're not religious, but then you keep kosher, people think, 'What a great guy!'"

At the same time, Gold never downplays the important role that Judaism has played in his life.

"I really love the traditions, and often see them as customs. Not to mention, what could be better than Shabbat?"

To keep his life in balance, Gold explains that he has a Jewish act and a secular act that he performs depending on the context. In his secular act, Gold describes his shtick as "just a Jew doing comedy," peppering his routine with political impersonations and curse words.

In other routines, Gold's mother is the only one who curses. "In Half Jewish, I have my mother introduce the show in a surprise recording I got of her. She talks about how I was born with a lot of talent – and extremely wide shoulders," he says.

On the more religious side, Gold is occupied every fall hosting a Chabad telethon in California.

"They keep me away from the serious pieces," he explains. "I do singing, dancing, comedy. Not the real stories of drugs, abuse, homelessness you find throughout the event."

Half Jewish, Half Very Jewish is what Gold calls a unique hybrid of his secular and religious acts, blending cantor impressions with real prank video footage and political commentary.

"This was the first time I didn't have to worry about censoring myself, because I wasn't working for hire. People could come see me at their own risk."

Gold emphasized how much he loves the Montreal audiences, and has travelled there seven times to perform. He reflects that being on stage in Montreal is "a lot like his bar mitzvah," only he gets paid less.

Gold's love of standup dates back almost that far, as he was just 16 years old when he got his first standup gig. He continued to perform standup throughout his years at Boston University and was signed to a network television show immediately upon graduation.

"I never had to come out to my family that I was a comedian," he says. "They already knew so early."

Though Gold admits he was never the class clown, he does describe his childhood persona as "the class comedian."

At a young age, he discovered that doing impressions of teachers and celebrities was a great way to get attention.

"I noticed that I had a talent for impressions, and people liked me better for it, so I figured I'd stick with it. Let's face it – we all just want to be liked."

Gold says that when he saw Billy Crystal on Saturday Night Live, he knew once and for all that comedy was for him.

Though he hasn't yet made it to Saturday Night Live, he's been a successful writer, producer, actor, and starred in the television series Stacked in 2005.

When he's not performing, 38-year-old Gold still has a lot to juggle. As a father to four young kids, he notes that it can be very challenging to balance his responsibilities, especially since his kids don't find his jokes remotely funny.

"My eldest saw one of my acts, and he just sort of stared at me, and said 'I don't get it.' It was actually kind of a relief," Gold laughs. "I wouldn't want my humour to be perfectly suited to an eight-year-old."

As for the future, Gold has his sights on starring in a hit TV show, a movie, and taking his latest standup act across the globe.

"I really just want to be the poor man's Jackie Mason," he says. "I'll take my show wherever there are Jews who will watch it."

EU responds to controversial article

By ADAR PRIMOR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Is the crisis in relations between Israel and Sweden coming to an end? Italy's foreign minister, Franco Frattini, would like to believe it is.

Frattini told Ha'aretz by telephone that he recently met with his Swedish counterpart, Carl Bildt, and the two agreed that at a meeting of European Union foreign ministers later this week, they will work to pass a resolution making it clear that the EU, under the Swedish presidency, strongly condemns anti-Semitism and will take action against any manifestation of it on the continent.

Frattini said he intends to demand that the meeting's summary statement explicitly condemn the article published in the Swedish tabloid Aftonbladet, which claimed that Israeli soldiers harvested the organs of dead Palestinians. He said his proposed statement would declare articles of this sort to be "acts of blatant anti-Semitism."

"There are limits to freedom of the press that stem from respect for the truth and the duty of every journalist to prove his claims," Frattini said.

The accusations in the Aftonbladet article are "terrible conclusions, lying and hurtful, and they have the power to assist all those who seek to incite against Jews or who oppose the existence of the State of Israel," he added.

Italy, Sweden to propose resolution condemning anti-Semitism

However, Frattini stressed, "the state cannot intervene in the work of the press. The journalists are the ones who must set limits for themselves and must find the right balance within the framework of the journalistic code of behaviour."

Frattini said that's why the EU Council of Ministers, which was scheduled to discuss the situation in the Middle East this week, is the correct forum "for Sweden to prove, with concrete steps, its determined stance against anti-Semitism. It would be better for the Swedish response to be expressed there than via a government communiqué to the press."

Frattini does not believe that the crisis with Sweden, the current president of the EU, has affected relations between Israel and Europe in general. As one of the architects of an agreement to upgrade ties between the EU and Israel, he is encouraged by the fact that Italian pressure led to a decision that separates discussions about the peace process from implementation of the agreement regarding the proposed statement on anti-Semitism.

Some in Israel believe that the Italian minister is simply engaging in wishful thinking. But Frattini is convinced that he is right. "Now that the agreement has been adopted, there is no turning back," he said. "No country will block implementation of the upgrade."

Carl Bildt

The Israeli Prime Minister's Office opted not to comment on the Italian-Swedish initiative for bringing the crisis to an end. In contrast, the foreign ministry's position was clear.

"Every initiative against anti-Semitism is welcome," said Yigal Palmor, the ministry's spokesperson. "But if the declaration is general and does not specifically relate to the article in Aftonbladet, it will not resolve anything.

"We did not ask for an apology, or for measures against the newspaper or the journalist," he added. "All we asked of Sweden and the Swedes is that they reject and decry the content of the report. And our position has not changed."

Netanyahu meets Brown, Merkel

JTA

LONDON — The prime ministers of Israel and Britain met in London last week and agreed on the need for progress in the Mideast peace process.

During their hour-long meeting Aug. 25 at 10 Downing Street, Benjamin Netanyahu and Gordon Brown also discussed the importance of acting to prevent Iran from producing nuclear weapons.

In the issue of West Bank Jewish settlements there was some disagreement. Brown said his government sees building in the settlements as an obstacle to the idea of two states for two people.

While Netanyahu has not approved any new settlement construction since coming into office, he says settlements should be allowed to expand for "natural growth."

Netanyahu also made a clear distinction between building in eastern Jerusalem and in other areas of the West Bank. "Jerusalem is not a settlement," Netanyahu said at a joint news conference following the meeting. "We've been building there for 3,000 years."

Netanyahu outlined his plan for peace with the Palestinians on the basis of a demilitarized Palestinian state alongside Israel, and Brown endorsed Netanyahu's call for action to build the Palestinian economy. Netanyahu said he wants to see a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem "once and for all," explaining that he sees the solution as lying within a future Palestinian state, so that Israel will remain a Jewish state.

Hundreds of anti-Netanyahu demonstrators gathered outside the gates to the prime minister's official residence, forcing Netanyahu's motorcade to enter through a side entrance. The demonstrators held signs saying "Free Gaza" and referring to Netanyahu as a "war criminal."

In related news, Netanyahu's office denied reports that Israel has agreed to halt construction in West Bank settlements.

At a news conference in Berlin last Thursday following his meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Netanyahu also said the Palestinians first must recognize Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state before negotiations could be held.

Merkel said Israel must stop building settlements in the West Bank if there is to be progress in peace talks with the Palestinians.

The two leaders also discussed Iran. Merkel said that if Iran's government does not respond to overtures from the West by September and halt its uranium enrichment program, the international community should seriously consider tougher trade sanctions against the Islamic Republic, particularly in energy and finance.

Netanyahu said the sanctions should "really hurt," and that if the UN Security Council does not act, a "coalition of the willing" should.

It's not clear that UN Security Council members Russia and China would support tougher sanctions against Iran. The other three permanent members of the council – Britain, France and the United States – would likely do so.

The two leaders also reportedly discussed the case of abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Germany has played a key role in mediating efforts to win the release of Schalit, who was taken captive by Hamas in 2006.

In an interview Aug. 27 with a German news agency, a senior Hamas leader said the group was waiting for Israel to respond to a possible deal for Schalit, the Jerusalem Post reported.

During his visit to Germany, Netanyahu also met with German President Horst Koehler and Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

Netanyahu's state visit included a tour of the museum and archive at the House of the Wannssee Conference, the villa where plans were laid out in January 1942 for the extermination of European Jewry.

On behalf of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Israel, Netanyahu also received a donation of original architectural drawings of the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp, which were found in Berlin last year and purchased by the Axel-Springer media company.

Think-tank wants UN to declare Palestinian state

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Gershon Baskin, an Israeli peace advocate and CEO of the Israel-Palestine Centre For Research and Information (IPCRI) – a joint Israeli-Palestinian think-tank in Jerusalem – believes the only way to achieve Mideast peace is by having the international community impose a Palestinian state on Israel.

In fact, Baskin declared last month that he was the one who gave the idea to European Union Foreign Policy chief Javier Solana, who said earlier this year that United Nations Security Council should recognize a Palestinian state even if there is no deal between Israel and the Palestinians.

"[Solana] heard it first from me, but it's fine, let Solana get the credit," Baskin said Aug. 8 in Beit Jalla, near Bethlehem, at an IPCRI conference titled "Education for Peace."

Baskin said that under his proposed plan, the United States wouldn't use its United Nations veto power to prevent the UN Security Council from recognizing a Palestinian state within provisional borders.

He told the conference – attended by Israelis and Palestinians – that two weeks before the conference, he met for "secret talks in the U.S." with five Palestinians, five Americans and five Israelis about his plan.

According to Baskin's proposal, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas would submit a request to the Security Council asking for a state of Palestine to be granted full membership in the UN.

Without a U.S. veto, the request would likely receive the necessary nine of 15 votes within the council that it would need in order to pass.

At that point, "the state of Palestine will become a full member state obligate by the UN Charter," Baskin said.

"At that moment, the Israeli occupation of one member state of another will require a new Security Council resolution that will supersede [Security Council] resolution 242 and all other resolutions on the Israeli -Palestinian conflict."

The proposal also says that the "main elements of the new resolution would be the re-confirmation under international law of the 'two states for two peoples' solution."

Baskin added that once this occurred, the UN could deploy international forces to implement a two-state solution, with Jerusalem as a capital for both states.

Baskin's proposal states: "The implementation process would have to include several elements – the resolution would state the principal that the international community is prepared to use… the [UN] Charter and to deploy international forces (military, police, and civilian) to supervise the Israeli withdrawal from Palestine."

In addition to putting forth this proposal to Solana, Baskin told the conference that he has presented his plan to the Americans.

When asked specifically whom the plan was sent to, Baskin said it was presented to two deputy secretaries of state and the office of the U.S. special envoy to the Middle East, George Mitchell.

He said that in the first week of August, he also met Rafik Husseini, Abbas' chief of staff, and gave him the plan to present to the PA president, adding that he expected it to have been given to Abbas after Fatah's recent convention in Bethlehem.

Gershon Baskin

A June 13 article in Ha'aretz reported that while in London, Solana said that "after a fixed deadline, a UN Security Council resolution should proclaim the adoption of the two-state solution."

Solana also reportedly said that the UN "would accept the Palestinian state as a full member of the UN and set a calendar for implementation."

Baskin told the conference that Solana made his comments without first notifying Mitchell, suggesting that they were intended as "a trial balloon."

Baskin's plan can be viewed on IPCRI's website at www.ipcri.org/files/ending.pdf.

In an abstract of his talk, Baskin said that, in his view, "there will not be any successful bilateral Israeli-Palestinian negotiations at any time in the near future."

He argued that once the United States and the UN take steps to recognize a Palestinian state, the peace camp in Israel will be able to rally around it and be revived.

Asked whether the Canadian government funds IPCRI, Rodney Moore, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and National Trade in Ottawa responded by e-mail that the "the government of Canada supports IPCRI discussions through funding with the Network for Peace Fund of the Canadian International Development Agency. This is the one current project that Canada is supporting with the IPCRI. The government… is not affiliated with the selection of discussion topics, but supports the overall objective of Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, including through IPCRI."

Contacted for further comment, a PMO spokesperson gave the same response.

In an interview with The CJN, Israel's deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon called Baskin's proposal "nonsense" adding that "the United States will not impose a solution on Israel, let alone the United Nations."

Benny Begin, a Likud MK and minister without portfolio in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, called Baskin's plan "strange and queer."

"If Canada is funding Baskin, I imagine that they don't realize what he has been proposing [or doing]. I can hardly imagine that the Canadian government, a country that is friendly to Israel, would be supporting this, if they knew."

Olmert faces corruption charges

The false information included falsified travel routes and inflated costs for flights. The reimbursement was sought from a number of organizations at the same time.

The indictment lists 17 flights in which the costs were inflated. Among the organizations that paid for these flights are Akim, Yad Vashem and State of Israel Bonds, among others. The extra money was kept in a checking account under Olmert's name.

The indictment shows that Olmert owed money to Rishon Tours and in May 2007, transferred 12,460 shekels ($3,280 US) to cover a quarter of the debt. Rishon Tours' owner Emanuel Baumelshpiner had covered the rest from the accounts of other clients at the office, without their knowledge or agreement.

According to the charges, in order to hide the fact that he purchased tickets from Rishon Tours, which had not won a tender that made it an authorized ticket sales officer for the Ministry of Industry and Trade, which Olmert headed at the time, he made use of other offices that had won tenders for the transfer of the funds. In his statements to the State Comptroller, Olmert is accused of hiding the fact that he had an account with Rishon or the fact that he owed the company money.

The other charges have to do with the Talansky Affair and the Investment Center. According to the indictment, Olmert received more than $600,000 US between the years 1997 and 2005 from American fundraiser Morris Talansky. The funds were transferred in a number of ways: directly into a bank account, in envelopes of cash, or through Olmert's former bureau chief, Shula Zaken.

Some of the money was placed in a secret account held by Olmert's confidant and former partner, attorney Uri Messer, and according to the indictment, more funds were delivered to this account from sources that are not known to the prosecution.

As reported by Ha'aretz, $300,000 US of the money Talansky gave Olmert was used to cover debts of a non-profit organization that backed Olmert when he ran for mayor of Jerusalem in 1998.

Regarding the Investment Center charges, Olmert is accused of "a conflict of interest" with the clients of Messer in a business issue that affected him and his function as industry minister. The indictment refers to "serious personal obligation toward Messer, at which time he should have taken himself out of the entire dealing with Messer and his clients."

Olmert's communications adviser, Amir Dan, said Sunday in response to the indictment that "after they removed a prime minister from government, it was clear that the attorney general and the State Prosecution had no other option than to file an indictment against Olmert.

"The court of law, on the other hand, is free of such ulterior motives, and therefore Olmert is convinced that at the court, he will be able, once and for all, to prove his innocence," he added.

Arabs paying price for the Holocaust: Tutu

By AKIVA ELDAR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — "The lesson that Israel must learn from the Holocaust is that it can never get security through fences, walls and guns," Archbishop Emeritus Desmond Tutu of South Africa told Ha'aretz last week.

Commenting on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's statement in Germany on Aug. 27 that the lesson of the Holocaust is that Israel should always defend itself, Rev. Tutu noted that "in South Africa, they tried to get security from the barrel of a gun. They never got it. They got security when the human rights of all were recognized and respected."

The Nobel Prize laureate spoke to Ha'aretz in Jerusalem as the organization The Elders concluded its tour of Israel and the West Bank. He said the West was consumed with guilt and regret toward Israel because of the Holocaust, "as it should be."

"But who pays the penance? The penance is being paid by the Arabs, by the Palestinians. I once met a German ambassador who said Germany is guilty of two wrongs. One was what they did to the Jews. And now the suffering of the Palestinians."

He also slammed Jewish organizations in the United States, saying they intimidate anyone who criticizes the occupation and rush to accuse these critics of anti-Semitism. Rev. Tutu recalled how such organizations pressured U.S. universities to cancel his appearances on their campuses.

"That is unfortunate, because my own positions are actually derived from the Torah. You know God created you in God's image. And we have a God who is always biased in favour of the oppressed."

Rev. Tutu also commented on the recent call by Ben-Gurion University professor Neve Gordon to apply selective sanctions on Israel.

"I always say to people that sanctions were important in the South African case for several reasons. We had a sports boycott, and since we are a sports-mad country, it hit ordinary people. It was one of the most psychologically powerful instruments.

"Secondly, it actually did hit the pocket of the South African government. I mean, when we had the arms embargo and the economic boycott."

Rev. Tutu said that when reformer F.W. de Klerk became president of South Africa, he telephoned congratulations. "The very first thing he said to me was 'Well, now will you call off sanctions?' Although they kept saying, 'Oh well, these things don't affect us at all,' that was not true.

"And another important reason was that it gave hope to our people that the world cared, you know, that this was a form of identification."

U.S. drops demand: report

The Obama administration reportedly has dropped its demand that Israel curb construction in eastern Jerusalem. Israeli officials and western diplomats said that the Obama administration has backed away from its demand that Israel limit construction intended for Jews in the predominantly Arab eastern part of the city. While the sources said the United States wouldn't condone such construction – the United States doesn't recognize Israel's annexation of east Jerusalem, an area the Palestinians claim as the capital of their future state – the sources said the Americans would no longer demand Israel fully cease construction there.

Arab volunteers rising

The number of Israeli Arabs volunteering for national service has quadrupled since the program first began four years ago. Israeli officials said the number of Israeli Arab volunteers shot up to 1,050 last year from 240 when the program first opened in 2004. "The numbers certainly speak for themselves," said Lior Shohat, the public affairs coordinator in the Administration for National Civil Service. "Currently, the demand is exceeding the amount of vacancies we can offer. I can safely say that if we had more vacancies the number of volunteers would have been much higher." National service is offered to Israeli Arab youths as a substitute to mandatory military service in the Israel Defence Forces, from which they are exempt. Those who choose to take part in the program are still a small minority of Israeli Arabs.

Lawyer sues Swedish paper

An Israeli lawyer has sued a Swedish newspaper over its report on allegations that Israel harvested organs from Palestinian prisoners. Attorney Guy Ophir filed a $7.5 million (US) libel suit in New York last week against Aftonbladet, the Swedish tabloid that published the report Aug. 17. Ophir said the article's allegations were anti-Semitic and amounted to a "racist blood libel" against Jews. "It's something Goebbels would have written," Ophir told the Jerusalem Post. Ophir said he would donate any funds won through the lawsuit to charity, including the Israel Defence Forces.

Heart treatment breakthrough?

Israeli researchers succeeded in growing heart tissue in the abdomen of a rat and then implanting it into another animal's damaged heart. The experiment, which was published this week in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, shows that it's possible to rejuvenate the heart after an attack. Typically, a heart attack leaves a scar that exerts pressure on the heart, often leading to another attack. The tissue patch prevented this deterioration.

Dead Sea makes short list

The Dead Sea has made the short list in a competition to select the New Seven Wonders of Nature. Two Middle East landmarks – the Dead Sea and Lebanon's Jeita Grotto – made the list of 14 sites selected by online and telephone voters, the Media Line reported. "We are very happy, but there are still two years ahead of us and we need to encourage one billion people around the world to vote for us, so we are trying to keep our heads clear," Israeli tourism official Gura Berger said.

Schools lose funding for discriminating

The Education Ministry cut off funding to three private religious schools in Petah Tikvah after they refused to enroll students from Ethiopian backgrounds. Some 109 new Ethiopian students arrived in the city over the summer. They were distributed randomly among the three private but publicly funded schools. The students are required to attend religious school as part of their conversion to Judaism. The schools claim the children from the Ethiopian community require more time and funds than other children to bring them up to academic standards.

Doug Pepper guides top Canadian publishing company

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

With a roster of internationally renowned authors ranging from Margaret Atwood and Mavis Gallant to Alice Munro and Michael Ondaatje, McClelland & Stewart is probably Canada's premiere publishing house

Such is its exalted status that the federal government issued a postage stamp for its centenary in 2006

For the past five years, the company – whose published writers have also included Stephen Leacock, Lucy Maud Montgomery, Leonard Cohen and Anne Michaels – has been guided by a Torontonian, Doug Pepper.

As president and publisher, Pepper, 47, runs McClelland & Stewart on a day-to-day basis, overseeing its business and editorial arms. Supported by a well-honed staff, he is responsible for its financial well-being and acquiring new manuscripts and seeing them through to publication.

Last year, McClelland & Stewart – which is jointly owned by Random House and the University of Toronto – published more than 100 titles, with about 40 per cent being fiction.

Although foreign-owned rivals like HarperCollins and Penguin publish more books, McClelland & Stewart is still the largest independent publisher in Canada, Pepper said in an interview.

A graduate of Forest Hill Collegiate, he studied English literature, philosophy and film at U of T.

Before taking over the helm of McClelland & Stewart in the spring of 2004, he was vice-president and senior editor at Crown Publishing Group, a division of Random House, in New York City.

Although Pepper was quite happy in the Big Apple, the epicentre of the publishing industry in North America, he recognized that the opportunity to run a blue chip company like McClelland & Stewart was irresistible.

"It felt right to return to Toronto," he said, acknowledging that skeptics who wonder why a high-powered executive and editor would even consider the notion of giving up an important position in North America's cultural capital.

"I still run into that attitude," he added

Pepper readily admits he was not planning to leave New York City

"I hadn't wrapped my head around it."

But early in 2004, out of the blue, two members of McClelland & Stewart's board called to inquire whether he would be interested in becoming its new president.

"It came completely as a surprise I didn't even know who was running McClelland & Stewart."

By then, he had been at Crown Publishing Group for a few years.

"New York was fabulous," he said. "I enjoyed every minute of it. I could have stayed there for the rest of my life."

As senior editor, Pepper acquired and edited books by Jimmy Breslin, Jonathan Kozel, Christopher Buckley, Anne Coulter, Philip Lopate and Douglas Rushkoff.

And he and his wife, former Montrealer and fellow book editor Susan Burns, loved the East Village in Manhattan where they lived.

But the chance to be his own boss at a company in need of fresh thinking and innovative ideas proved to be compelling. Simply put, McClelland & Stewart had not made the requisite changes that were necessary to accommodate a new ownership.

In 2000, 14 years after buying McClelland & Stewart, Toronto entrepreneur Avie Bennett astonished observers by signing over 75 per cent of its assets to U of T.

Random House – which owns 25 per cent of the shares – markets, sells and distributes McClelland & Stewart books

"We needed a new approach," he explained, saying that McClelland & Stewart had to pare overhead and change the perception that it was stuck in the musty past.

Since then, Pepper has virtually restructured the company.

"We've already dealt with the harsh economic issues," he noted. "We feel good about our model."

Yet awesome challenges loom in this bleak recessionary economy.

"We're not seeing growth. We were close to profitability in 2008. It was a tough year in general."

Shifting taste in readership is also a problem.

"People, in some ways, are reading more. But they tend to gravitate toward known brands – bestsellers."

Since Canadians and Americans are reading less diversely, non-bestsellers are suffering in the process.

"It would be nice to see the wealth spread out a bit more," he said.

Pepper – whose personal preferences in non-fiction run the gamut from memoirs and cookbooks and whose tastes in fiction include Ian McEwan, Philip Roth and Ian Fleming – decided to make a career in publishing after graduating from U of T in the mid-1980s.

Pepper's late father, Elliott, a family lawyer, hoped he would study law. But Pepper was eager to attend the special Radcliffe program in publishing at Harvard University.

"It was a very workshop-oriented course, a boot camp in publishing that fast tracked you to a job. It seemed like a good thing to do."

Focusing on books and magazines, the eight-week course – which has since moved to Columbia University in New York – convinced Pepper that publishing was his forte

"I kind of fell in love with publishing," he said.

One of the greatest influences on him was a New York publisher named Helen Wolff, a German Jew who had fled Nazism in the 1930s.

"She urged me to go into publishing, saying it was a noble profession."

After Radcliffe, Pepper was offered a position by the United Nations, but he declined, thinking it would be a dead-end job.

Returning to Toronto, he worked for a small book packaging firm, Somerville House Books.

"I was very junior at that point, reading manuscripts and learning the business."

He joined Random House Canada in 1987. By the mid-1990s, he had advanced to the position of vice president and editorial director.

In 1998, Crown Publishing Group came calling. Six years later, McClelland & Stewart hired him.

Though he misses New York City and does not rule out the possibility of going back again some day, Pepper is content in Toronto.

"What's good about Canada is that we're smaller, can take more risks and are not as driven by the bottom line. And I like the pace in Toronto, which is not as hectic as New York."

The father of two children, seven-year-old Sophie and three-year-old Leo, he also likes the fact that his mother, Phyllis, and his brother Andrew, a CBC radio employee, live in Toronto as well.

And, of course, Pepper is pleased to have landed the gig at McClelland & Stewart.

"It feels right to me. I'm proud to be working for an honoured Canadian publisher."

Regensburg is a city of surprises

By NANCY LISS
Special to The CJN

For travellers to central Europe, the German town of Regensburg has surpassed its reputation as merely a pleasant little day stop on the many river cruises along the Danube

Largely untouched by the bombing that damaged so many cities during World War II, this delightful UNESCO town (100 kilometres from Munich and 200 kilometres from Prague) boasts more than 1,000 original buildings. With its meandering cobblestone streets, hidden passageways and garden cafes, restaurants tucked into grandiose Patrician courtyards, a romantic old stone bridge, and a magnificent noble palace, this travel destination delivers one surprise after another

In the centre of the Neupfarrplatz (New Parish Square), an unusual site has visitors stopping and taking notice. Occupying 160 square meters of the platz is an ultra-modern collection of white geometric forms seemingly out of place in front of the antiquated New Parish Church. Keep in mind that "New" in this case refers to the Middle Ages

Seated comfortably on various parts of the sprawling monument are tourists and townspeople munching on snacks, looking at city maps, snapping pictures, or simply stopping to rest before continuing on their way. Upon closer inspection, one finds the word mizrach, (meaning east) in Hebrew letters etched into one of the steps. Three plaques stand by the church, written in German, English, and Hebrew, explaining the history and the meaning of the site

Created by world famous Israeli artist, Dani Karavan, the work of art is called Place of Encounter. Using 72 different concrete shapes, Karavan copied the floor plan of a synagogue that was destroyed in 1519, when the Jewish population was expelled. The use of 72 pieces has a biblical significance In Genesis, it is written that 72 nations settled the Earth after the flood. The plaques by the church explain that the word mizrach was carved in the area of the former Torah shrine of the synagogue. In fact, the remains of the original synagogue lie directly below Karavan's symbolic work of art

Today, people of all faiths and backgrounds congregate at the Place of Encounter, fulfilling Karavan's vision of making the monument an interactive community gathering place.

Thurn and Taxis Palace, an opulent reminder of grandiose days. [Ted Liss Photos]

Archeologists were aware that Regensburg's Medieval Jewish Quarter, comprising 40 buildings or more, used to lie directly beneath the square next to the church, but they assumed any evidence of the synagogue was long gone, especially since a bomb shelter had been constructed underground during World War II. However, in the course of the city's restructuring works on the Neupfarrplatz beginning in 1995, layers of civilization dating back more than 2,000 years were discovered: the remains of the Jewish quarter and the old synagogue, along with sections of the Roman legionary fortress, Castra Regina.

Visiting the actual archeological evidence underground requires a special guided tour through the Document Neupfarrplatz. The term "Document" takes its name from the vast collections of building documents spanning the 2,000-year history of the square. The first specific record of a Jew in Regensburg was a man simply named Samuel, documented in the year 981. By the 11th century, the Jewish population was so significant, written records refer to Regensburg as habitacula judeorum (area where Jews live).

Place of Encounter, Neupfarrplatz, by Israeli artist Dani Karavan.

The Document Neupfarrplatz is an easy site to miss. A rather small, triangular entrance on the square reveals a staircase leading down to the excavation. The entrance is situated at the side of the church, next to some fruit and vegetable stands that are set up in summer.

Deep within an underground room, stools are arranged facing a television screen. An impressive virtual tour recreates the ancient Jewish quarter, bringing to life the stone corridors, archways and structures below ground. The multi-media presentation is based on the excavations that took place on the square. It shows the team of archeologists unearthing the stone walls of the Jewish quarter and the excitement as one of them discovers three small clay jugs filled with 624 precious gold coins (dated 1372) hidden in the basement of a wealthy Jewish merchant

Copies of the coins are on display underground, but the real coins, as well as many other Jewish and Roman artifacts from the area, can be seen at the Historisches Museum on Dachauplatz

For an easy, convenient tour around Regensburg, visitors with limited time can get an overview of the town by taking a little tourist train that makes its rounds past the highlights of the city in about an hour. CityTour ticket sales and information are available at the Tourist Information Centre at Rathausplatz. The train stops at Neupfarrplatz, but tours of the Document underground must be booked separately

Regensburg has another well known claim to fame. It is the chosen hometown of Pope Benedict XVI. Known to Regensburgers as Joseph Ratzinger, he was a theology professor and vice-president of the University of Regensburg. The Pope's parents and sister are buried in town but his brother, Georg, still lives there. In fact, his brother's home is directly across the street from the Jewish Cultural Centre, which houses the city's Orthodox shul

In 2006, when the pope made his historic visit to Regensburg, he scheduled a day for a private visit with his brother A problem arose, about what to do with the considerable entourage accompanying the pope. The Jewish Cultural Centre came to the rescue by generously offering to entertain these high profile guests for the day, providing them with a kosher lunch and dinner. It became quite a news event around town that the Jewish Cultural Centre entertained the entourage of the pope.

For visitors with more time to spend, a short trip to Emmeramsplatz leads to the stunning Thurn and Taxis Palace, the princely residence of a powerful family dynasty that lasted for over 350 years. The sheer opulence and grandeur of their fairy tale palace takes visitors by surprise. Clearly, one of the town's most significant buildings, a tour of the palace, along with the accompanying museum and the 1,000-year-old Cloister is a must-see that will not disappoint.

The Old Stone Bridge leading to the town gate.

To arrange a tour of the Document Neupfarrplatz, contact Matthias Freitag at the Museums of the City of Regensburg (+49-941-507-3442, email: museumsfuehrungen@regensburg.de) or the Regensburg Tourism Office (+49-941-507-3413, email: tourismus@regensburg.de).

Nancy Liss' visit to Regensburg was partially subsidized by the city of Regensburg Tourism and Media Office.

New Toronto film fest program focuses on Tel Aviv

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Tel Aviv will be the focus of the Toronto International Film Festival's new City to City program.

This year's festival, the 34th, runs from Sept. 10 to 19.

The 10 Israeli films in the program examine a city that is marking its 100th birthday this year. Tel Aviv was founded in 1909 as a Jewish suburb of Jaffa, a predominantly Arab city.

A mix of features and documentaries, the films explore a dynamic metropolis widely regarded as Israel's cultural capital.

Jaffa, as seen from Tel Aviv.

Israeli movies have been a constant presence at previous Toronto festivals, but the inaugural City to City program highlights them as never before.

In alphabetical order, the following films will be screened:

Bena, by Niv Klainer, is about a concerned father who tries to keep his schizophrenic son out of a psychiatric institute. When he brings home an illegal Thai alien to care for his son, the uneasy balance in the house is disrupted.

Big Dig, a 1969 farce by the writer and director Efraim Kishon, turns on an escapee from a mental institution who brings Tel Aviv to a shuddering standstill with a jackhammer. Influenced by the Marx Brothers, the movie has been restored by the National Center for Jewish Film at Brandeis University.

Big Eyes stars Uri Zohar as a manipulative basketball coach and womanizer who is forced to decide what he really wants out of life. Zohar also directs.

The Bubble, by Eytan Fox, was the first Israeli feature film about a gay relationship between an Israeli Jew and a Palestinian Arab. It is mainly set in Tel Aviv's hip Sheinkin St. district.

A History of Israeli Cinema, a two-part Israel/France co-production by Raphael Nadjari, examines the trajectory of Israel's film industry from 1932 to the present.

Jaffa, a contemporary Romeo and Juliet story by Keren Yedaya, charts a doomed romance between a Jewish woman and an Arab mechanic who works in her father's garage.

Kirot, by Danny Lerner, is a drama about an Russian illegal immigrant who is forced into violence. The lead actress, Olga Kurylenko, appeared in the last James Bond thriller.

Life According to Agfa stars Gila Almagor as the owner of an all-night bar who listens to her customers' woes and tries to make sense of her difficult romantic relationship. Assi Dayan is the director.

Phobidilia, by Yoav Paz and Doron Paz, focuses on a young man who treats TV and the Internet as his trusty companions.

Four additional films from Israel will be screened as well.

Samuel Maoz's Lebanon is set during the 1982 war in Lebanon and zeroes in on a tank crew caught up in a threatening situation.

In Five Hours From Paris, by Leon Prudovsky, romantic sparks fly when an Israeli taxi driver and a Russian music teacher meet by chance in the City of Lights.

Ajami, by Scandar Copti and Yaron Shani, turns on an accidental murder, an opaque drug deal and a spurt of violence, all taking place in Jaffa.

In Carmel, Amos Gitai reflects on his past as a soldier in the Israeli army and on his son's tour of duty in Israel's armed forces.

The festival will also present A Serious Man by the American brothers Joel and Ethan Coen. Their latest feature touches on interlocking themes such as faith, Judaism, family responsibility and mortality.

Marc Levin's documentary, Schmatta: Rags to Riches to Rags, looks at the once prosperous but now declining garment industry in New York City.

Bob Richman's Ahead of Time is a profile of the Jewish American journalist Ruth Gruber, who covered the refugees aboard the ship Exodus in 1947.

A momentous moment in modern U.S. history unfolds in The Most Dangerous Man in America: Daniel Ellsberg and the Pentagon Papers, directed by Judith Ehrlich and Rick Goldsmith.

The Soviet Jewish Communist Leon Trotsky is a palpable presence in The Trotsky, a feature film by Canadian Jacob Tierney starring Jay Baruchel and Saul Rubinek.

The subtext in The Day Will Come, by German filmmaker Susanne Schneider, is homegrown terrorism.

Marco Bellocchio's Vincere is a fictionalized portrait of fascist leader Benito Mussolini before his rise to power in Italy.

Bassidji, Mehran Tamadon's film, explores one of the pillars of the Islamic Republic of Iran.

Organizers disappointed at director's pullout

The Toronto International Film Festival has expressed disappointment with a decision by a Canadian filmmaker to withdraw his film in protest over the inclusion of Israeli films at a special festival program focusing on Tel Aviv.

John Greyson, a leading director of gay-themed movies and a professor at York University's film department, pulled out his short film, Covered, last week.

Greyson, a supporter of the organization Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, said he was not against Israeli films per se, but objected to the character of the forum in which they will be screened.

Greyson, who has denounced Israel's "brutal occupation" of the West Bank, suggested that the films in the City to City program were too uncritical of Israel.

Several months ago, Israel's consul in Toronto, Amir Gissin, voiced the hope that Israel's image would be improved by its participation in the festival.

The festival's co-director and its manager of corporate communications, Cameron Bailey and Marie Nazar, both said they were "disappointed" by Greyson's position.

Bailey said he had no regrets about having chosen the Israeli films and that the City to City program would go on as scheduled.

In a statement of support for Greyson, the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel encouraged filmmakers and audiences to stay away from the City to City program.

Last April, after verbally accepting an invitation to enter one of his films at a gay movie festival in Tel Aviv, Greyson rescinded his acceptance.

A vocal supporter of the Palestinian cause, he cited Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip as a reason for pulling out.

He also said he supported a cultural boycott of Israel.

As reported by Ha'aretz, Yair Hochner, organizer of the gay movie festival in Tel Aviv, criticized Greyson's decision to boycott Israel.

"What Greyson has done is an act of violence both against Israeli gays as well as [gay] Palestinians, for whom this festival is a rare ray of light."

U.S. stars featured in new Shalom Sesame instalment

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Jake Gyllenhaal and Christina Applegate are among the stars slated to appear in a new Sesame Street-style production geared at teaching Jewish-American children about Jewish culture.

Shalom Sesame, a 12-part series for preschoolers featuring the globe-trotting Muppet Grover, will explore Jewish identity and traditions and will film on location at several Israeli sites, including the Western Wall.

Big-name guest stars, including actors Debra Messing, Greg Kinnear and Cedric the Entertainer, will join puppets and children in segments filmed in Israel and the United States, according to the series' producers. A spokesperson said actor Ben Stiller is also expected to join, but he hasn't given final confirmation.

Anneliese van der Pol, a Broadway actress and star of the Disney Channel's That's So Raven, had never been to Israel before arriving last week to film her scenes with the Muppets.

"I think it's really important to educate children in a fun way and a not too confusing way," said the 24-year-old musical star, who is Jewish and is named after teenage Holocaust victim Anne Frank.

Shalom Sesame, first produced in 1986, has sold more than one million copies. The new version will tackle more issues of diversity for Jewish children and be accompanied by an interactive website and other outreach material.

Much of the Jewish community outside Israel may never visit, so this is a great way to have a virtual experience of the country, said the project's executive director, Danny Labin.

The series is expected to debut around Chanukah in December 2010.

Matisyahu offers 'a broad array of sounds' on new CD

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

It might seem obvious, but being both an Orthodox Jew and an international reggae star isn't always easy. Just ask Matisyahu, a religious, Bob Marley-inspired musician who enjoys wearing his tzitzit as much as his American Apparel sweatshirts.

"It's tough," says the Brooklyn-based artist whose real name is Matthew Paul Miller. "There's always that line you cross back and forth between creativity and religion. It's a give and take. The challenges are always there, but, for myself, I've seen growth."

It took a while for Matisyahu to get where he is today, however. When he hit the road in 2006 to promote his incredibly popular sophomore album Youth, some people took issue with his shtick.

"When I started, the thought of coming across in a negative way didn't enter my mind," he says. "I was just excited by my new-found religion – it was new to me then – and I thought, everyone's going to understand where I'm coming from. That wasn't the case. For a lot of people, it was too much to get.

"Looking back, there have been certain advantages and obstacles with my religion."

While the singer doesn't delve further into what exactly those obstacles were, it's clear that whatever was standing in his way is gone. His new album, Light, is a sharper, more focused collection than his previous album. He veers away from some of Youth's straight-up reggae, delving into rock, rap, electronica and lighter jam band sounds instead.

Matisyahu says the new sounds came out of the music he's been listening to over the last few years – in other words, he's put the reggae CDs away.

"I had been listening to reggae all the time, so it had an influence on my style," he says. "The last couple of years was more about a broad array of sounds and not getting obsessive over one artist or style."

Another change is that his new disc isn't as explicitly religious as Youth – there's nary a mention of HaShem or Torah on the album. But that doesn't mean his Judaism didn't influence the messages on this record.

"I'll take a story or prayer from the chassidic philosophy," he says. "I'll find something that gets me going and think about how that resonates in me and try to write from an intuitive place.

"This album is a bit more moody," he adds. "It's more up and down and more personal, with a different level of depth to it from what I've done in the past."

Matisyahu's new album is bit more moody.

The more introspective lyrics, Matisyahu explains, were a result of the time he had taken off after he stopped touring Youth. He had been on the road for a couple of years, and going back home helped him reconnect with his surroundings.

"I wrote and recorded the disc at home, which forced me to get back in touch with myself," he says. "There was more time for me to go inside and get back to myself, figure out what's going on and how to relate to everything."

Writing at home post-tour meant there were three years between albums. It's a time frame Matisyahu doesn't want to repeat.

"I'll try to not wait so long before I get started with the next record," he says. "I think now I have a sense of how to get these things done better. There was a learning curve, but I've figured it out."

The company is also presenting The Soul of Gershwin, The Musical Journey of An American Klezmer. An actor playing George Gershwin as narrator and three top vocalists and a "matchless on-stage band" together transport viewers back to the New York City of the immigrant era, bustling with diverse cultural influences and seemingly disparate musical genres. Iran leaves heavy footprints in the Middle East

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thirty years ago, Iran made the yawning transition from a constitutional monarchy to an Islamic republic. Its new supreme leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, scrapped Iran's fruitful relationship with Israel and permitted the PLO to take over the Israeli embassy in Tehran. In time, Iran called for Israel's destruction, formed alliances with Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas, sponsored terrorism, embarked on a serious quest to acquire a nuclear arsenal and attain hegemony in the Middle East, and joined the ranks of Holocaust deniers. No wonder Iran is Israel's most deadly enemy.

Israel and its ally, the United States, have attempted to meet the Iranian challenge by various means – covert negotiations, arms deals, dialogue, containment and confrontation with its proxies. None of these strategies have worked.

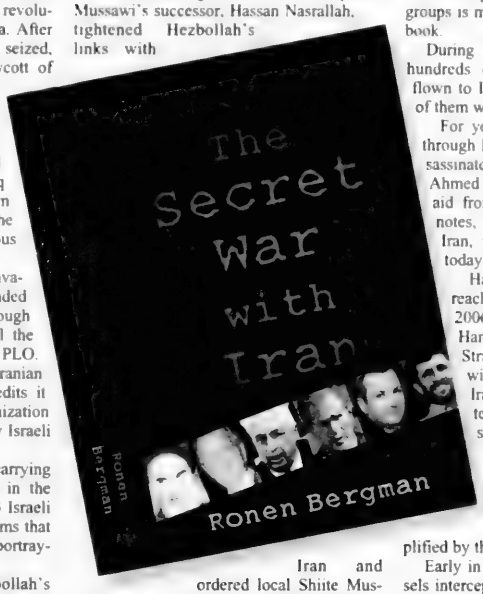
One of Israel's leading investigative journalists, Ronen Bergman, a reporter on the staff of Yedioth Ahronoth, chronicles Iran's role in the region and Israel's attempts to engage and confront it in The Secret War with Iran (Simon & Schuster). He covers a lot of ground, tracing Iran's support of Hezbollah and the Palestinians and documenting Iran's budding nuclear program. It is based on a decade of research and interviews with more than 300 people in 20 countries.

As he suggests, Israel found it difficult to internalize that the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran had ushered in a new era. After the U.S. embassy in Tehran was seized, Washington declared a general boycott of Iran. Nonetheless, Israel, in a Machiavellian operation code-named Seashell, secretly sold military equipment to Iran, hoping that such sales would leave it with a foothold in Tehran and bleed Iran and Iraq as they fought a lengthy war from 1980 onward. Bergman describes the clandestine transactions in voluminous detail.

According to Bergman, Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 had unintended consequences. It enabled Iran, through its sponsorship of Hezbollah, to fill the vacuum left by the expulsion of the PLO. Claiming that Hezbollah was "an Iranian organization from day one," he credits it with being a tough, well-trained organization that could not be easily penetrated by Israeli intelligence.

Bergman credits Hezbollah with carrying out two separate suicide bombings in the Lebanese city of Tyre that killed 103 Israeli soldiers and Shin Bet agents. He claims that Israel covered up the first attack by portraying it as a gas leak.

Israel's assassination of Hezbollah's secretary-general, Abbas Mussawi, in 1992 was a devastating blow. But in response, Mussawi's successor, Hassan Nasrallah, tightened Hezbollah's links with Iran and ordered local Shiite Muslims to blow up the Israeli embassy and the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires, leaving Israel and Argentinian Jews in a state of shock.



Bergman argues that Israel's failure to find Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad – whose jet was shot down over southern Lebanon in October 1986 – was "one of the most stinging intelligence defeats suffered by Israel in the struggle against Iran and Hezbollah."

He agrees that Imad Mughniyah, Hezbollah's chief of operations until his assassination last year, was a formidable adversary. Apart from orchestrating the Tyre attacks and devising the guerrilla campaign in southern Lebanon – which claimed the lives of 250 Israeli soldiers from 1985 until Israel's pullout in May 2000 – he planned the kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, an event that touched off the 2006 war in Lebanon.

Bergman does not explicitly claim that the Mossad was behind Mughniyah's assassination in Damascus, but notes that the hit was "exactly the kind of thing needed to restore [Israel's] faith in, and more importantly the enemy's fear of, Israel's intelligence services."

In almost the same breath, he says that the current director of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, who has held that position since 2002, has taken "certain pre-emptive actions" against Iran.

He cites "mysterious explosions" at the Natanz and Isfahan nuclear sites, flawed and unusable equipment purchased by Iran for its nuclear centrifuges, crashes of airplanes carrying personnel connected with the security of Iran's reactors, and the murder of a top-flight Iranian scientist employed at a uranium enrichment facility.

Iran's sponsorship of radical Palestinian groups is meticulously set out in Bergman's book.

During the second Palestinian uprising, hundreds of wounded Palestinians were flown to Iran for medical treatment. Some of them were recruited as agents.

For years, Iran extended its influence through Islamic Jihad. But after Israel assassinated Hamas' spiritual leader, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, Hamas began accepting aid from Tehran. Previously, Bergman notes, Yassin kept his distance from Iran, whose supreme religious leader today is Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Hamas' co-operation with Iran reached an unprecedented level in 2006, when Ismail Haniyeh, now the Hamas prime minister in the Gaza Strip, visited Tehran and returned with $240 million in promised Iranian assistance. "Iran is the strategic depth of the Palestinians," said Haniyeh during his visit.

Being an equal opportunity supplier of arms to the Palestinians, the Iranian regime has also funnelled military equipment to the Palestinian Authority, as exemplified by the Karine A incident.

Early in January 2001, Israeli naval vessels intercepted the Karine A, a ship loaded with Iranian arms. The voyage was organized and financed by a close confidant of Yasser Arafat, the then president of the Palestinian Authority. In Bergman's assessment, the Karine A shipment "represented a significant escalation in Iranian support for... the Palestinians."

Ranging farther afield, Bergman implicates Iran in the abortive attack on the Israeli embassy in Bangkok, Thailand, in 1994. Thai police arrested an Iranian citizen, who was sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

Canada, perhaps surprisingly, comes into play in Bergman's book. Starting in 1997, Hezbollah began using Canada as a base for raising funds through car theft and smuggling, he claims without elaboration.

In addition, Bergman cites the case of Fawzi Ayoub, a Lebanese Shiite who arrived in Canada in 1992 and became a courier for Hezbollah, performing various tasks. On his return to Lebanon, he was recruited for a terrorist mission to Israel. Arriving in Israel with a false U.S. passport under an assumed identity, Ayoub travelled to Hebron, where he met a man who was supposed to take him to a secret weapons cache. Israel got wind of the plot and Ayoub was arrested.

In concluding The Secret War with Iran, Bergman says that Iran and Hezbollah are Israel's most dangerous enemies in the Mideast. The Second Lebanon War, which may have been a dress rehearsal for a clash between Israel and Iran, greatly strengthened Iran and Hezbollah and solidified Iran's alliance with Syria.

In closing, he observes: "Iran aspires to export its revolution, still activates Palestinian terror against Israel, and is still bent on acquiring nuclear weapons."

Scary stuff.

Charest wants more Jewish immigrants

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Premier Jean Charest put out the welcome mat for Jewish immigration, asking the community to help encourage Jews from around the world to make the province their home.

"I'd like to see Jews from all over the world look to Quebec and see that this is where they would like to live. For too many years, too many in the communities went elsewhere, because they did not feel comfortable here," Charest said at a dinner hosted by Federation CJA and Quebec Jewish Congress on Aug. 27.

Charest said Quebec needs to boost its population if it wants to be economically strong and maintain its social expenditures.

This was the first time Charest, who was first elected in 2003, spoke at such a gathering of the Jewish community, and he came at its invitation.

Close to 500 people attended the elegant $150-a-plate event at the Gelber Conference Centre, including six provincial cabinet ministers, Liberal, Parti québécois and Action démocratique du Québec MNAs, federal MPs and senators, the mayors of Trois-Rivières, Ste. Agathe des Monts and St. Jérôme, diplomats from several countries, and representatives of a number of ethnic communities. Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay was unable to attend, because of a death in the family.

"The presence of so many parliamentary colleagues should be taken as a compliment. It speaks of the very high esteem in which we hold the Jewish community," said Charest, who received standing ovations before and after his address.

Charest recalled that the last time he was in the federation's Cummings House was six years ago when he attended the opening of the Holocaust museum with his then 15-year-old son.

Any Quebecer who visits that museum, he said, will understand why the State of Israel was created and why Jews hold it so dear. "When you know the history, you know why this state exists today and why the state is so important to the people of Israel."

Attachment to Israel or Canada does not detract from being a proud Quebecer, he added.

"We are all Quebecers, proud of our origin. Identification with being Jewish or with Canada or Israel is not a contradiction, but a source of enrichment."

Charest was effusive in his praise for the contribution of Jews to Quebec in many spheres over more than 200 years, and he paid particular attention to the community's history in his native Sherbrooke, which today has a Jonathan Rosenbloom Street, in recognition of one of its prominent citizens.

Charest's scheduled topic was to share his vision of the future of Quebec.

He described the province's current economic situation as "fairly good" with a relatively low deficit that represents 1.3 per cent of gross domestic product.

"That's half of the federal government's and Ontario's, and in the United States it's about 12 per cent and Europe 5.3 per cent."

The Quebec and Canadian economies have weathered the downturn better than most other places because "we're dull, we save more, we capitalize more. Dull is good."

Prudent management of the country's banks and financial institutions have left Canada and Quebec in relatively healthy shape, he said.

To attract more people to Quebec, Charest said he is seeking partnerships with Europe that will be "models of globalization," allowing freer economic, research and cultural exchange.

Premier Jean Charest, right, is welcomed to Cummings House by Quebec Jewish Congress president Adam Atlas, left, and Federation CJA president Marc Gold.

"With a country the size of Canada, no one is going to come knocking on our door. We have only three per cent of the world's economy. We have to go out there and persuade others to work with us."

He also wants to make it easier for workers to move within Canada and said Quebec is nearing the conclusion of a deal with Ontario to create "the fourth-biggest economy in North America."

Charest, who was elected to his third term in December 2008, also spoke of his long-term dream of developing the vast territory of northern Quebec, which has great untapped resources, including recently discovered diamonds.

Charest, 51, believes he will see the opening of a new maritime route in the Arctic within his lifetime. Today, the United States, Europe and Russia don't recognize the territory as Canadian, "yet it is ours," he insisted.

As a token of appreciation, Charest was presented with a sterling silver mezuzah with two small fleur-de-lys in its design.

The only discordant note of the evening was a noisy demonstration outside the building by about 100 bikers protesting the Quebec government's increase in motorcycle registration fees.

CHAT grad gets golf scholarship to NCAA school

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Russell Budd got the same start in golf that countless other Canadian kids did – his dad gave him a plastic set of clubs at the age of three.

He quickly took to whacking hollow balls around the yard, and in a couple of years, he graduated to a set of real clubs that his father had cut down for him.

Typical, yes, but the next step in his golf evolution is something barely contemplated by most of his contemporaries, for whom the sport is no more than an opportunity to have some fun on weekends.

Now 18, the graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto has been offered a golf scholarship to DePaul University. He'll be heading to the Chicago-based school this month to start his first season of NCAA golf while earning a degree in sports management.

It's a far cry from tooling around Pleasure Park, the defunct golf centre located in the middle of an apple orchard near highways 7 and 400. Budd recalls his dad taking him to the course, the only one that let him play as a youngster. "He carried me in one arm and the clubs in the other," he said.

The Big East Conference of the NCAA will no doubt be more demanding than the wide-open spaces of Pleasure Park. Budd is naturally looking forward to the experience, not necessarily because he sees a professional career down the road, but because "I love golf. I think it's a great chance for me to improve."

DePaul will provide "new scenery," good competition, high-level coaching and the opportunity to play against golfers from such renowned conference schools as Notre Dame and Georgetown.

Numerous books have been written about the mystical nature of golf. Budd has his own take on the game's intangible benefits.

"I like the fact it's a sport that has to do with sheer ability and how much you practise," he said.

"You're competing against yourself. Every course is different. No two rounds are the same."

Something of a gifted athlete – he was centre-fielder on the TanenbaumCHAT baseball team that recently won a TDCAA championship – Budd said he has "a natural swing."

He's not expecting the coaches at DePaul to tinker with it, and he'll continue with his philosophy that "whatever feels good, is comfortable, I'll do."

His approach clearly has paid dividends. While only 5-8 and 155 pounds, Budd is able to accurately drive the ball 285 yards off the tee.

But it's his short game that is his real strength, he said. He averages 30 putts per round and hits an average of 12-1/2 greens in regulation.

Russell Budd

Budd's golf and workout regimen is pretty intense. While still at school, he'd leave TanenbaumCHAT at 4:30 and drive up to Eagles Nest Golf Club, where his coach, Henry Brunton, runs an instructional school, or to Bayview Country Club, where he's a sponsored member.

He'd practise and play for 2-1/2 hours, generally focusing on putting (1-1/2 hours), chipping (1/2 hour) and hitting balls (1/2 hour).

With school over, he's now at the course at 8 a.m. for practice, followed by a round of 18 holes, followed by lunch, then chipping, putting and more hitting. On most days, he puts in 10 hours, but that can stretch out to 12 hours prior to tournaments.

So far this season, he's finished 13th at the CN Future Links Ontario Championship at Cobble Beach Golf Club in Owen Sound; he reached the sweet 16 at the Ontario Men Match Play event at Lake Joseph Golf Club, and he's scheduled to compete at the Investors Group Ontario Junior Championship at Whistle Bear Golf Club in Cambridge.

Last year, he finished sixth at the Ontario Juniors.

Budd won the Ontario Bantams in 2004 and has represented Canada in international tournaments such as U.S. Kids and Optimist. In 2008, he represented Ontario at the Williamson Cup and finished sixth at the American Junior Golf Association's Lessings Open. He is currently ranked 32nd in the RCGA Canadian Junior Order of Merit.

"Russell will be an excellent addition to our program," said Betty Kaufmann, coach of DePaul's men's golf team. "His golf game continues to grow and get stronger with his experience on the Canadian teams. We are excited to have him."

Maccabi Haifa advances in Champion's League

By JOSEPH SERGE
CJN Staff

Israeli soccer champions Maccabi Haifa will face traditional Italian powerhouse Juventus – nicknamed "The Old Lady of Italian Football" – and two other top sides after qualifying for the group stage of European soccer's most prestigious club tournament, the Champions League.

Haifa defeated a lacklustre Austrian club Red Bull Salzburg 3-0 last week to advance to this stage. They're the first Israeli team to reach the group stage more than once.

The other teams in their group are German champions Bayern Munich and the French side Bordeaux. But it could have been worse. Other teams in the group stage of the Champions League include the cream of European soccer, Manchester United, Chelsea, Real Madrid and Barcelona.

The top two teams of each of the eight groups advance to the next playoff stage. The third-place teams qualify for the less prestigious, but still competitive, Europa League. Realistically, this would be Haifa's goal.

Haifa started the game in Ramat Gan last week with an advantage after beating Salzburg in Austria 2-1. Coach Elisha Levy decided to sit out promising striker Shlomi Arbeitman in favour of the Georgian Vladimir Dvalishvili, who scored Haifa's first goal in the 31st minute. Levy also started 17-year-old hopeful Eyal Golasa, who also scored.

Reaching the group stage is a windfall for the club, who will get a minimum 7 million euros bonus from UEFA, European soccer's governing body.

Haifa last reached the group stage in 2002. Maccabi Tel Aviv is the only other Israeli team to have reached this stage before, in 2004.

Inside Back

The joy and benefits of music

Lately, a lot of media attention has been paid to music. Almost every day, something is reported about the benefits of music. Most music lovers don't have to be convinced of the benefits and enjoyment that music provides. Many seniors have enjoyed music all their lives, and many, having been exposed to music lessons as children, have continued to play or listen to music as they've aged

The Senior Side of Life

I was lucky to be brought up in a musical family. My late grandmother had a beautiful voice and sang in a Yiddish choir. As a child, I accompanied her on the piano as she practised, and she would shlep me to productions at New York's Yiddish Theatre on 2nd Avenue, where I saw epic Yiddish musical productions. My mother played the piano, and my father loved music, and I recall buying classical recordings from my very early childhood years. It was at the Brighton Beach subway station after a Yiddish Theatre production that my bubby experienced the first symptoms of a brain tumour that months later resulted in her death. I will never forget that scene on the subway platform.

There now seems to be a new dimension to the effects of music on our minds and souls, and in our health-conscious culture, if you can show that something is "good for your health," it's a real media and public winner

I recently heard a radio advertisement that started with two young children singing together and featured a voice extolling the benefits of the Royal Conservatory of Music's "Smart Start" program for children, which purportedly enhances children's "neural networks." According to the program's website, "Recent research has revealed that music is a crucial building block in early childhood development, and the global leader in creating and providing such breakthrough programs is the Royal Conservatory." If this is so, it would be a wonderful gift from a grandparent to a grandchild to enrol them in such a program

Next, I came across an announcement from researchers at the University of Maryland's school of medicine that said the cardiovascular benefits of music are similar to those found in their previous study of laughter. The principal investigator, Dr. Michael Miller, said music that made study participants feel good caused tissue in the inner lining of blood vessels to dilate, or expand, which increased blood flow. The study showed that compared to the baseline, the average upper arm blood vessel diameter increased 26 per cent after joyful music, while listening to music that caused anxiety narrowed blood vessels by six per cent. Apparently, listening to enjoyable music is good for your heart and blood vessels – a finding that doesn't require a change of clothes or the purchase of expensive exercise or sports equipment.

Topping it all off was the wonderful 2007 movie Young at Heart, directed by Stephen Walker, about a volunteer choir of seniors. Their exuberant director teaches them to perform the most contemporary and outstanding music, with the final result being a community concert that rocks the audience and brings enormous joy to the performers.

The message to seniors and family members reading this column: get out there and sing, play, listen to and promote anything and everything related to music. The joy can be endless, and the benefits seem to be extraordinary.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindzenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press). His latest book, Brooklyn Beginnings. A Geriatrician's Odyssey, can be researched from his website: http://www.drmichaelgordon.com.

A look inside the lunch box

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

As kids get ready to head back to school, many parents – myself included – shudder at the thought of preparing another year of lunches. It seems to be a chore that moms and dads find very difficult.

Let me try to make it a little easier for you this year.

When packing a lunch, consider what your child really likes to eat and what he or she is actually willing to eat at school. They're two totally different things.

Their favourite sandwich in the world may be tuna at home, but they may flatly refuse to eat it at school. So have a conversation with your kids. Ask them what they like in their lunch boxes and what they have time for at school and can easily manage.

Consider where your child is eating lunch in terms of mess, convenience etc., as well as how much time they have (usually not enough) and how old they are. Can they manage to peel their own orange? Is there time? Do they have enough napkins for the juice? Are they eating a snack outside? If so, is there a container to carry, garbage to dispose of or gloves that might prevent ease of consumption?

Once all of that has been considered, and once you know that you're packing things that they're actually going to eat, try to make lunches that are as balanced as possible, because, after all, it's a long day, one that requires energy and brain power, and we want them to eat.

When it comes to balance, repetition is OK, if that's what your child likes, so relying on the same turkey sandwich, cheese string, yogurt product or chocolate milk as your protein source every day is OK, as is relying on the same apple or carrots as your fruit or vegetable.

Throughout the year, keep checking back with your kids and asking them what they like or would like, because as the weather changes, so do preferences.

Never again – the time has come!

Sirens are going off in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and Be'er Sheva.

Hamas is shooting missiles into Israel, and Hezbollah is sending small groups of suicide bombers into Jewish cities and towns on the Lebanese border. Meanwhile, Iran is making it clear that it has a nuclear bomb with the capacity to reach Israel.

This triumvirate of Israel/Jew haters is on schedule with a plan to destroy the Jewish state.

Israel responds with strength by closing its border with Gaza and positioning troops in the north. Quotes roll off the tongues of government spokespeople by the hour, declaring Israel's right to defend itself, even pre-empting an attack, when faced with the threat of nuclear war.

Around the world, Israeli ambassadors are called into government offices and rebuked for their country fuelling the flames of war in the Middle East. They're lectured by foreign ministers in Argentina and Ghana, and told these nations will sever ties with Israel if the Israel Defence Forces doesn't immediately withdraw from the northern and southern borders and back down from a threat of a nuclear strike against Iran.

The Doomsday Clock clicks one minute closer to midnight.

While all of this is happening, anti-Semitism creeps out of the boiler rooms of the hateful and begins to harass and vandalize shuls, synagogues, temples, Jewish schools and cemeteries and Jewish-owned businesses. Swastikas are scrawled on Jewish homes on Glencairn Avenue, Chabad Gate and Harbord Street. Anti-Semitic noise heightens on the Internet, and Jew-baiting and Jew-hating becomes a little bit more acceptable. Angry youths openly wear T-shirts with hyperbolic anti-Semitic jargon, and university presidents punish Jewish students for protecting themselves against hateful mobs.

It's difficult to gauge the temperature of the next anti-Semitic flare-up, but one thing is clear: during the recent war in Gaza, anti-Semitism surged in Britain, Greece, the United States, Canada, Venezuela, Argentina and many other countries.

Holocaust analogies were used against Israel, and political cartoonists everywhere were quite comfortable comparing then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert to Hitler. Jews were beaten up in Russia, and skinheads in places such as Belgrade thought nothing of threatening and pounding the crap out of our brothers and sisters.

Will the above hypothetical scenario happen? Will anti-Semitism soar while Israel and the Jewish world are under siege?

Is it possible that something less, perhaps more civil, will engulf the world and all 194 countries will recognize Israel's right to defend itself and the need to legislate against anti-Semitic actions?

It would be nice, but not likely. Not yet.

A brute is strategizing and preparing to knock us on our face. When the brute makes its move, Israel will defend itself. As soon as it does, malicious and nasty anti-Semitic men and women will try to intimidate and terrorize us.

So why aren't our leaders planning to create the largest, well-staffed, volunteer-based organization ever to protect our children and secure our future as Jews? What's happening in our organizational offices and neighbourhood homes to ensure that you and I play a role in a strategy to fight back?

Nothing, once again?

Call your rabbis and community leaders and demand that they begin planning for a worldwide entity that will prepare us for "Esau's visit" and that they embrace those non-Jews who want to stand next to us and wrestle hatred everywhere.

If you've ever attended a Holocaust education lecture, travelled on Birthright Israel or March of the Living, remember what you learned. Anti-Semitism can be fought. Just ask the Danish people.

Come on! Enough with the lectures and books. It's time, once again.

Film fest rejects celebrity protest

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A week after filmmaker John Greyson pulled out of the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) to protest its City to City Spotlight on Tel Aviv, more than 50 actors, directors and authors endorsed a letter that also objects to the festival's decision to highlight Israeli film.

The signatories – including actors Danny Glover and Jane Fonda, authors Naomi Klein and Alice Walker, musician David Byrne and director Ken Loach – published the online letter, titled "The Toronto Declaration: No Celebration of Occupation," last week. It said they were "deeply disturbed by the Toronto International Film Festival's decision to host a celebratory spotlight on Tel Aviv.

"We protest that TIFF, whether intentionally or not, has become complicit in the Israeli propaganda machine."

The letter cited a CJN article ("Brand Israel set to launch in GTA," from Aug. 21, 2008) in which Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, discussed a forthcoming "Brand Israel" pilot campaign that aimed to "make Israel relevant" to Canadians by highlighting the country's cultural and scientific contributions to the world.

Gissin noted at the time that plans were in the works for a major Israeli presence at the 2009 film festival.

MADONNA LOVES TEL AVIV

After her two concerts in Tel Aviv last week, pop star Madonna visited the graves of some of the great talmudic and kabbalistic sages in Safed, including that of Rabbi Yitzchak Luria, the Ari Hakadosh, whose thought formed part of the structure of the Kabbalah that is studied today. [Israel Sun photo]

Cotler briefs South African leaders on Iran

After meeting with senior government leaders in South Africa recently, MP Irwin Cotler will be watching developments closely at the United Nations later this month to determine whether his power of persuasion had any effect.

As it has for the past five years, the UN General Assembly will consider a Canadian resolution to condemn Iran for a host of human rights violations.

In the past, South Africa has voted against the resolution, but Cotler is hoping that after briefing the country's president, Jacob Zuma, and several cabinet ministers about Iran's brutal treatment of minorities and its "genocidal" intention vis-a-vis Israel, South Africa will change its vote.

"South Africa should put its moral authority in support of the resolution," Cotler said on his return last week. "South Africa has moral authority that came with the anti-apartheid movement...The government now has the opportunity to exercise moral leadership in the matter of Iran."

Cotler, whose first visit to South Africa in 1981 landed him briefly in jail for urging the release of Nelson Mandela, also met the South African president in private, where he presented a verbal report about Iran's advocacy of "state-sponsored genocide, Haifa U Fetes Dr.

TORONTO — Dr. Michael Dan, former CEO of the drug firm Novopharm Biotech, will receive an honorary doctorate from the University of Haifa at a Nov. 15 tribute dinner in Toronto. Dan – a physician who heads Gemini Power Corp., a renewable energy company, and holds a PhD in experimental medicine from McGill University as well as an MBA from Tulane University – is being honoured for his commitment to human rights, philanthropy in Canada and Israel, and his support for the university, the Canadian Friends of Haifa University said.

More Charges Laid

TORONTO — Ontario's environment ministry laid seven new charges under the provincial Environmental Protection Act Aug. 28 in connection with the massive propane blast last summer in Toronto that killed one man and left 10,000 people temporarily homeless. Sunrise Propane faces five charges, while its directors, Shay Ben-Moshe and Valery Belahov, face one charge each of failing to comply with a ministry clean-up order at the site. If convicted, each man could face fines of more than $500,000, while the company could pay more than $2.5 million, the North York Mirror reported. A court date is slated for Sept. 17. Sunrise also faces $1 million in fines for two charges laid by the Ministry of Labour.

Survivor Honoured

HALIFAX — Auschwitz survivor and Holocaust educator Philip Reitman has been named to the Order of Nova Scotia, his province's highest honour. The Bedford, N.S. resident, who was in his mid-teens when his family was deported to the Prezhany Ghetto in Belarus, has spent the last 20 years speaking to young people about his experiences.

Incidents Spike

BUENOS AIRES — Anti-Semitic incidents increased dramatically in Buenos Aires in the first two months of 2009, says a new report on anti-Semitism published by the DAIA Argentine Jewish political umbrella group. The report showed 253 anti-Semitic incidents in January and February, compared with 302 such incidents in all of 2008. Most of the incidents were anonymous e-mail threats and graffiti. The spike was prompted by Israel's Gaza invasion, officials said.

Iranian Prez To Speak

NEW YORK — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will speak at the United Nations General Assembly, UN officials said last week. The visit will come a week after a Sept. 15 deadline set by the United States and other western nations for Iran to accept an invitation to hold talks on its nuclear program.

Museum Shooter Appears In Court

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The man charged with killing a security officer at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum made his first appearance in court on Sept. 2.

James von Brunn, who is charged with gunning down guard Stephen Johns on June 10, was wheeled into a hearing in a Washington federal courtroom.

Previous hearings were delayed because of the injuries von Brunn sustained from the return fire of museum security officers after the 89-year-old white supremacist started shooting at the entrance to the museum.

Prosecutor Nicole Waid said at the hearing that von Brunn wanted to "send a message to the Jewish community" that the Holocaust was a hoax. She said von Brunn planned the shooting months in advance, and had set up funeral plans and put his finances in order because he expected to die in the attack, the Washington Post reported.

Von Brunn objected to his lawyer's request, later granted, that the judge order a mental competency exam.

"Your Constitution guarantees me a speedy and fair trial," he said, according to media reports. "I'm a United States citizen, and as a U.S. Naval officer, I swore to protect my country. I take my vows seriously."

Philanthropist Dies

PITTSBURGH — Alex Grass, founder of the Rite Aid pharmacy chain and a prominent Jewish philanthropist, died Aug. 27 of respiratory failure at his family home in Harrisburg, Pa. He was 82. He turned a discount store in Scranton, Pa., into the national Rite Aid chain, which has 4,900 stores and $24 billion in sales. He was a member of the United Jewish Communities/Federation board of trustees and a past national chair of United Jewish Appeal, as well as chair of the board of governors of Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Jewish groups criticize 'omissions' in York report

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University's Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community released its findings last week in a detailed 26-page report, but some Jewish groups are disappointed that it had "several noticeable omissions" and didn't specifically address the issue of anti-Semitism on campus.

The 13-member task force – comprising six students and six faculty members, and chaired by York's vice-president academic and provost, Patrick Monahan, the former dean of Osgoode Law School – was established in March in response to the increasing tensions on campus between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students.

On Aug. 31, the task force report was submitted to York's president, Mamdouh Shoukri, who is expected to respond to it at the end of the month.

Some of the recommendations are to create a committee to promote open discussion and debate; to create more and better student study and social space on campus; to expand the Student Code of Conduct to include student rights, and to provide better enforcement of university policies relating to the use of space on campus.

The task force consulted with York students – members of York Federation of Students, as well as the Muslim Students Association, Hillel at York University and Students Against Israeli Apartheid – and reviewed 79 written submissions from community and student groups.

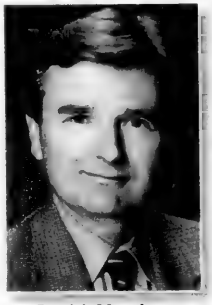
The task force also met with York administrators and consulted with officials at the University of Toronto, Ryerson University and Concordia University.

Although many of the recommendations in the report had to do with better enforcement of existing rules, regulations and policies, the task force said that its "primary focus is on promoting more speech and expression, rather than less. We believe there needs to be more and better opportunities for dialogue, debate and discussion on the York campus."

In line with this focus, the task force suggested the creation of a standing committee on campus dialogue, composed of students, faculty and administrators, to foster "an inclusive exploration of important public issues from the widest possible range of perspectives."

Another suggestion in the report is that York should create more space for students to study and socialize on campus.

It said that the last decade saw a 50 per cent increase in York's student body, to about 60,000, but student space has "proportionately decreased" to make room for academic or program uses.



Patrick Monahan

The task force suggested that the open-concept Vari Hall rotunda, popular among student activists for staging protests and demonstrations, be converted into a student lounge area with "food service(s), cultural displays, information services, or a forum for debate and dialogue."

Monahan, who spoke with The CJN the day the report was released, said there are many reasons why Vari Hall isn't suitable for demonstrations.

"It does involve a disruption of classes. It does make it difficult for students who want to navigate around Vari Hall, but also we saw the need for more student space as a pressing priority and… here is a space that could be used more effectively for students," Monahan said.

The report also suggested that central outdoor areas on campus be used for demonstrations and other public events.

"We want to talk to student groups about what might be suitable. There are lots of places outdoors in a central location that could be used for demonstrations and other activities," Monahan said.

Signs to ponder from the south

From the editor's desk...

The results of a comprehensive study of the level of religious observance among Americans, entitled the American Religious Identification Survey (ARIS), were released last month to a considerable lack of fanfare and publicity. It was the third such study of Americans' religious observance, following upon previous studies in 1990 and 2001.

One of the sections of the larger study focused on the religious attitudes of American Jews – the American Jewish Identification Survey (AJIS). It was a shame that the survey results received such little media coverage for it contains some rather stunning findings.

Since the survey was conducted solely in the United States, its findings may not be entirely applicable to the Canadian community. But on the other hand, since the survey was conducted in the United States, some of its findings are likely winding their way up north towards us.

Noted scholars Barry Kosmin and Ayela Kaiser, the director and associate director, respectively, of the Institute for the Study of Secularism in Society and Culture at Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., were the authors of the study. They released the AJIS findings – appropriately in Jerusalem – to the gathering of the 15th World Jewish Congress.

The Washington Times reported upon the AJIS on Aug. 5. Reporter Julia Duin began her report with the following paragraph: "The rate of religious observance among American Jews has dropped precipitously over the past two decades, to the point where more than one out of every three Jews is thoroughly secularized."

In 1990, the survey showed that 20 per cent of Jewish adults – about 1.12 million people – described themselves as non-religious or cultural Jews. Today the number of "non-religious" Jews has risen to about 35 per cent, or 1.88 million people.

The survey asked respondents to define themselves as either Jewish by religion or Jewish by ethnicity, culturally.

The number of Jews in the United States has not grown in the past 19 years. Indeed, most demographic studies suggest the number has actually decreased by perhaps as much as 5.5 per cent, from 5.5 million people then to 5.2 million today.

The near doubling, therefore, of the number of Jews during that same period of time who consider themselves non-religious – whatever that may mean in a real, day-to-day sense – raises some rather important questions and serious matters for consideration by leaders planning policy for the Jewish community, as well as by parents planning policies for their families.

The first question that begs to be asked is: Why? If the results of the American survey are accurate, how can we explain the trend over the past two decades?

"I attribute the shift to a combination of disaffection from Judaism and intermarriage," Kosmin told the Washington Times. "Since 1990, half of all marrying American Jews have married non-Jews, with the result that there are two new mixed households for every homogeneous Jewish one."

Kosmin's co-author, co-researcher also attributed the increasing degree of non-observance among American Jews, and especially the generation of younger Jews to the rise in intermarriage. She described the 1.8 million Jews who defined themselves as Jewish only in the cultural sense as "the children of intermarried couples who were raised with no religion and as adults see themselves as having no religion."

To be sure, to self-define as ethnically or culturally Jewish as opposed to self-defining as religiously Jewish still means a Jewish self-definition of some significant sort. The individual, after all, still regards himself or herself as being Jewish and this is no small thing. From the individual's point of view, a strictly ethnic/cultural Jewish self-definition can still translate into a meaningful Jewish way of life.

But as past and current trends demonstrably prove, the extent to which a solely cultural Jewish self-definition will be transferred forward to the next generation appears to diminish over time. Moreover, the extent to which a solely cultural Jewish self-definition will transfer forward a wider, more profoundly Jewishly literate, way of life that includes some connection to "religion" is likely very slim.

The important ancillary question that must be asked and that has occupied educators, parents, community leaders and philanthropists at least for the last two decades is: If Jewish self-identity is not anchored to some extent at least on familiarity with and/or adherence to Jewish faith and traditions, to what extent will there be even solely ethnically Jewish self-definition in the years and decades to come? The evidence suggests: not much.

To what extent will the ever-expanding wide array of future Jewish communal needs be able to be met by an increasingly larger cadre of solely cultural Jews?

Community planners must take these questions and the range of possible answers into account when looking toward the future that we want to build. The implications of planning decisions today will have a far-reaching impact tomorrow for the Jewish community at home and for the various Jewish communities abroad – especially Israel, whose best interests and well-being our faith and traditions teach us are the concerns of all Jews everywhere.

The school year has just begun. Rosh Hashanah is around the corner. Now is a good time to ponder the signs reaching us from the south. MBD

Group loses school funding suit for disabled kids

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A group of Jewish and Muslim families who sued the Ontario government for not funding services to aid their special needs children in parochial schools lost its case in Ontario Divisional Court last week.

"Certain services for children in our [faith-based] schools with certain disabilities are funded by the government – through Community Care Access Clinics – whereas other services, available in public schools for children with different disabilities, are not funded. Therefore, discrimination on the basis of disability, contrary to the Charter [of Rights and Freedoms], was asserted," said Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools.

The group of eight families – seven Jewish and one Muslim – sued the Ontario government for not funding services for children who are blind, deaf or learning disabled and who attend non-Catholic faith-based schools. The lawsuit asserts that the government is violating the children's rights under the Charter.

The same services are funded for students in public and Catholic schools.

The lawsuit was filed in 2007.

Though disappointed in last week's decision, Walfish said the group has a "small window" in which to apply for leave to appeal the ruling, which he said it will do. He said the group is hopeful an appeal will be granted, because one of the three judges dissented in the case.

The CJN will have more coverage of this developing story next issue.

St. Paul's candidates speak to The CJN

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Next Thursday, voters in the provincial riding of St. Paul's will choose their new MPP.

The Sept. 17 byelection came as a result of former Liberal incumbent and attorney general Michael Bryant's April decision to leave politics.

Bryant had held the mid-town Toronto riding for the Liberals since 1999.

The four major parties are all vying to fill the vacant seat, and the Liberals, Greens and Conservatives have all fielded rookie candidates – respectively, they are Eric Hoskins, 48, a family physician and co-founder of the nonprofit War Child Canada; Chris Chopik, 37, a realtor and environmental activist; and Sue-Ann Levy, 52, the Toronto Sun's Queen's Park columnist, who is on leave during the campaign.

Perennial provincial NDP candidate, Julian Heller, is campaigning for the third time to win the riding.

Chopik, Levy and Heller are all Jewish.

All four candidates were interviewed last week on topics of interest to both the community and the riding. The candidates' answers are in no particular order.

The candidates' full biographies can be found on their respective campaign websites.

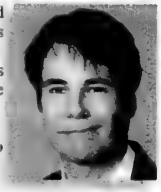
Chris Chopnik

Julian Heller



Eric Hoskins

Sue-Ann Levy

The CJN: Why did you decide to run in this byelection?*

Levy: "During the garbage strike, I became very disillusioned with the way our provincial and municipal politicians handled things. I just thought the residents of this city deserved much better. I would like to be the kind of politician that I would like to write about."

Heller: "The causes that are important remain. Having run twice before, [the NDP] is even more prepared to bring our message to Queen's Park on behalf of St. Paul's."

Chopik: "I think there are opportunities for the Ontario government to make stronger decisions to improve the quality of life in the province today and in the future. Specifically, I feel passionate about green economy and energy issues."

Hoskins: "For the last 25 years I've been involved in community service and development as a family physician, a public health specialist and through my work strengthening communities around the world. To some extent, I see this [opportunity] as a natural extension of that work. That there are very important issues facing all of us, whether it's the quality of our schools, the health care system, environment and the economy."

The CJN: What issues are you speaking to in your campaign?*

Levy: "The number one issue is the Harmonized Sales Tax [HST]. Next July, if [Ontario Premier] Dalton McGuinty has his way, when he harmonizes the GST and PST, he's going to try and sneak in an extra eight per cent tax grab on a whole list of goods and services – from your morning coffee, to gas at the pumps, to all kinds of accounting and legal services. People have been taxed to death in this city. Being a resident of St. Paul's, I feel the same tax burden they feel."

Heller: "[The HST]... is the wrong tax at the wrong time. The last thing [St. Paul's residents] need is a tax which will increase their rent, gas, hydro and [costs on] things all the way to coffee, newspapers and doughnuts. Also, examples like the E-Health and [Ontario Lottery and Gaming Corporation scandals], where there's either a failure to manage these government agencies or a lack of concern about this type of inappropriate behaviour with taxpayers' money, the people I'm meeting are saying there's no one speaking for them."

Chopik: "Ontario has invested significantly in some clean-tech companies with respect to their research and development, and innovation. We've got about 40 clean-tech companies with robust technologies ready to go to market. What they need now is some assistance to take our taxpayer investment and commercialize it... and get those products to market and start turning a profit." As for the HST, Chopik said, "We've seen the negative impacts of our municipal land transfer tax. And I don't think it's prudent to add to that. I think it's a poor decision."

Hoskins: "Explaining the HST. Many people want to understand this tax better. They've heard, from my opponents... just one side or a partial description of the reforms that are going to be put in place. There's the sales tax reforms, but there's also very substantial, almost unprecedented income tax reform, permanent tax cuts, at the provincial level. For example, 93 per cent of families in Ontario will see a permanent cut in the provincial tax that they pay, averaging about $250 per individual. Couples and families will receive transitional payments in the order of $1,000 as they work their way through the system. Many people haven't heard that part of it."

JNF to launch family tree-planting day in city

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Grab the kids, the grandparents, cousins, uncles and anyone else you think might be interested in planting a tree and head on over to Downsview Park on Sunday, Sept. 13.

That's the message JNF Toronto is spreading via e-mail, on its Internet Facebook and Twitter pages and in the media in advance of the second Downsview Park tree twinning event it will host this year.

The first tree planting event at the park occurred in June, when more than 1,200 students from both Jewish and public day schools from around Toronto converged on the park and managed to plant approximately 700 trees.

JNF Toronto chose the Downsview Park Foundation earlier this year as its twinning partner in Canada. For every tree planted at the park, another is planted in Israel's Yatir forest and reservoir.

Yatir forest, on the southern slopes of Mount Hebron near the Negev, is Israel's largest planted forest – administered by the JNF – covering an area of around 30 square kilometers.

Josh Cooper, executive director of JNF Toronto, told The CJN last month he hoped to build on the success of his organization's previous event and foresaw this new "family day" as the next logical step forward.

Children plant trees at Downsview Park in June [Photo courtesy Downsview Park]

"The goal is to create family time together to plant a tree," he said. "It's a great family event and it's something I certainly never had a chance to do with my family when I was a kid."

All the necessary tools for planting will be provided to participants upon arrival at the park.

The event is a win-win for both organizing parties, as JNF continues to fulfill its environmental mandate both here and in Israel, while Downsview Park has portions of its developing lands populated by a mix of Quaking Aspens, Balsam Poplars, Silver Maples and River Birch; all species native to the area.

Tony Genco, president and CEO of Downsview Park, said he was thrilled with JNF's request to use the grounds for their tree-planting activities.

Genco said his job is to adhere to the federal government's mandate to turn the former army base into an "urban park" where Torontonians and Canadians can come for a nature stroll or unwind by a man-made lake.

A swarm of volunteer tree planters and the increasingly friendly relationship with the JNF has helped move the plan along.

"We've already planted 55,000 trees to create a section of stewardship for the park," he said. "The government gave us the gift of land, but didn't give us the money to do anything with it. We hope to foster a sense of [environmental] stewardship…and JNF raises funds to plant trees."

Genco estimates the cost per tree at around $12 to $15.

"You've got to plant pot-able trees" and not saplings, he said, adding that all the trees planted at Downsview Park are purchased through local suppliers.

Early response and feedback from both the Jewish and greater Toronto community has been "extremely positive," Cooper said.

Genco dared other faith communities to organize their own tree planting events to help foster a sense of community and to make the park into the attraction it hopes to be.

"Right now we're working with the Jewish community, but we hope to get others. It's been a delight to work with JNF to take on this challenge," Genco said.

The twinning project between JNF Toronto and Downsview Park is the only one of its kind currently underway in Canada, but JNF Toronto said it hopes to "expand this across the country."

More than a tiff at the film festival

How far can the lie travel? Where will it stop? Does history teach nothing to the self-righteous, to the smug and sanctimonious who moralize on false principles and elevate deception into high cause? The lie – Israel as apartheid state – now wafts across the red carpet of the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF). And the result is a very foul odour that clings now to the entire festival.

As reported in this issue of The CJN, one week after filmmaker John Greyson publicly withdrew from the festival to protest the decision to showcase the city of Tel Aviv in the festival's inaugural City to City film series, more than 50 members of the artistic community – including Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Alice Walker, David Byrne, Wallace Shawn and Naomi Klein – signed a letter also denouncing the festival's decision.

The letter's signatories purported to take the high moral road in publicizing their opposition to the Tel Aviv spotlight. They were not opposed to including Israeli films or filmmakers, they said. Rather, they protested "that TIFF… has become complicit in the Israeli propaganda machine. We object to the use of such an important international festival in staging a propaganda campaign on behalf of… an apartheid regime." The letter they signed was titled "No Celebration to Occupation." The signatories may indeed be artists, but they are also brazen political hucksters peddling their biased, anti-Israel polemics as principled viewpoints, championing a lie as if it were truth.

No doubt embarrassed by the unwanted high-profile publicity, Cameron Bailey, TIFF's co-director, published an open letter explaining his reasons for the spotlight on the choice of Tel Aviv as the first City to City focus. He emphasized that the decision was made strictly on the artistic merits of the films on display and that "it as a product only of TIFF's programming decisions." That is to say, it was not part of an Israeli government program to re-brand Israel as more than a land of conflict, as the TIFF protesters had suggested.

But proving that there was more ideological resonance than artistic principle in his open letter, Bailey also added: "We recognize that Tel Aviv is not a simple choice and that the city remains contested ground [our emphasis]. We continue to learn more about the Palestinian-led Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement." While it's praiseworthy that Bailey defended TIFF's decision to screen the Israeli films, his unctuous, obsequious response is nevertheless offensive. It tramples truth into a dust of ignorance and dishonesty. By what factual or historical measure is Tel Aviv contested ground? If Tel Aviv is contested ground, then the very right of Jews to have a sovereign state is also contested ground. If this is Bailey's belief, then he joins cause with every dictatorial, oppressive, misogynist, tyrannical, despotic regime and gang of terrorists in the Middle East and elsewhere that would destroy the Jewish state. Israel is a dynamic, engaging, spirited democracy. No tiff, lies or wishful thinking at the Toronto International Film Festival will change that.

Message from the prime minister

On Sept. 1, citizens around the world paused to remember the outbreak of World War II.

The war ushered in the darkest era in human history. It was a time characterized by widespread devastation, genocide, and horrific losses of life. It was a war felt in every corner of the globe, including in Canada where more than 45,000 Canadians made the ultimate sacrifice in defence of freedom.

However, from that dark time we have learned valuable lessons that continue to guide us to this day. We are heartened by stories of the truly remarkable individuals who resisted tyranny and gave their lives for freedom and justice.

Canada was one of the first countries to respond at the outset of the war, and time and time again the world saw the bravery of Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen, whether it was at the beaches of Normandy, in Hong Kong, or in the liberation of the Netherlands and Italy.

They were, are, and always will be heroes. They represent the very best of what it means to be Canadian. They sacrificed to earn a victory that would protect future generations from the horrors they had seen. They deserve our eternal gratitude. We will always honour their service and their memory. Lest we forget.

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

CJC at United Church council (1)

I just finished reading letter writer Jack Chivo's myopic view of how Canadian Jewish Congress should have better advocated at the recent United Church of Canada General Council in Kelowna, B.C. ("UCC Israel boycott resolution," letters, Aug. 27).

The CJC delegation of three went into a lions' den and truly calmed the beasts. Is it a perfect solution? Of course not. It seems that the process of the United Church simply allows anti-Israel activists to bring these resolutions to the floor repeatedly. However, CJC deserves complete credit for stopping the most recent boycott resolution that very well may have passed without their active intervention.

Yes, CJC may have to do this all over again in three years. Thankfully, our community is blessed with dedicated professionals and community leaders who have the skill to defend Israel's honour.

Chivo would be better to praise positive outcomes than to criticize successful initiatives.

CJC at United Church council (2)

Having served as a Jewish representative to the last United Church of Canada General Council, held in 2006, I would like to commend the efforts of Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Canadian Jewish Congress in helping to avert passage of an Israel boycott resolution in Kelowna, B.C., recently.

In her Sept. 3 CJN column, Jean Gerber asks whether the Jewish community is wasting its time with the United Church. The question is a good one. Rabbi Bulka himself notes in his column that the issue isn't going away ("The United Church conference: a first-hand account," Sept. 3). It's likely that there will be more resolutions set before the General Council in three years time.

Nevertheless, we cannot leave the field to Israel's enemies. Cutting off dialogue might feel gratifying in the short term, but then where are we in our relationship with Canada's largest Protestant denomination? They may be declining in numbers, but they're not disappearing, and we have an interest in responding to anti-Israel sentiment wherever it arises.

Moreover, as Rabbi Bulka notes and as I experienced three years ago as well, Israel and the Jewish community do have great friends in the United Church. We need to support our friends in the church by our presence. The fact that I was invited to speak in 2006, and Rabbi Bulka was given the opportunity to speak this time in Kelowna, shows that there is still openness in the church to hearing the point of view of the mainstream Zionist Jewish community.

If the church ever does vote to boycott Israel, we will certainly have to revisit our relationship with them. But until then, we in the Jewish community have to continue to do the hard advocacy work on behalf of Israel that is required.

Rabbi Edward Elkin

Tri-state solution?

The solution for the Mideast rests with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. What they have to do is create a plan for a three-state solution. They should set up trade agreements, border regulations, form a commission to deal with stress at borders, and commissions to deal with education, health and agriculture to benefit Israel and the two Palestines. Let Hamas figure out when and if they want to join the tri-state solution.

Iranian Jew writes Persian poetry

By CYRUS NEEKPOUR
Special to The CJN

The 1979 Iranian revolution, one of the most important social upheavals of the 20th century, not only sent shock waves throughout the Middle East, it also changed the region's geopolitical landscape.

The immediate human cost of this seminal event was the migration of millions of Iranians to the West and other parts of the world. This massive migration included thousands of Iranian Jews who, at the time of the revolution, numbered more than 100,000. Iran, the land of Cyrus the Great, continues to be home to the largest number of Jews outside of Israel in the Middle East.

Roya Hakakian is a celebrated Iranian Jewish writer who was born in Tehran, and until the age of 19, she belonged to Iran's vibrant Jewish minority. The CJN recently sat down with Hakakian, who told her story of emigration – her split from homeland and life in the United States – and talked about the current struggle for democracy in Iran.

Hakakian's interest in poetry and writing began in her early teenage years when, under the influence of her father, she became connected to Iran's literary circles. Those connections inspired her to write poetry in Persian. Her poetry attracted the attention of her peers to the degree that a family friend once asked her to write a poem for their wedding. So it's easy to imagine how seriously Hakakian took her budding literary career. While focusing on literature, Hakakian also attended workshops in painting and the arts.

Hakakian's journey to the United States was an ordeal marked by uncertainty, separation from other members of her family, and a stay in other countries before she arrived there. She left her homeland reluctantly, as she believed that one should not leave his or her homeland at a time of crisis. But life under the new revolutionary regime had grown increasingly difficult as synagogues disappeared and the Jewish community came under pressure. This pressure for Hakakian and other young Jews meant that their chances of being admitted to university were reduced. The situation was further compounded by Iraq's invasion of Iran in September 1980. According to Hakakian, the shock of what was happening in her homeland was mostly a melancholy, personal one that took her some time to overcome.

Today, based in Connecticut and the mother of two, Hakakian is a producer, writer and poet. She was quick to note that these titles mean one thing – that she is a passionate storyteller. However, a great example of not just her passion but also her skills in storytelling is her acclaimed 2004 book, Journey from the Land of No: A Girlhood Caught in Revolutionary Iran, a memoir of growing up as a Jewish teenager in post-revolutionary Iran. The book, among other prizes, was Elle magazine's best non-fiction book of 2004.

Hakakian recalled her experience living in a Muslim country until the age of 19 as pleasant and full of beautiful memories, but she admitted that she and fellow Jewish friends and family members were more comfortable among themselves, and that in the presence of Muslims they were generally more careful in their manners. According to Hakakian, the difference in practice of Judaism in Iran and in the United States lies in the way otherness is tolerated. "In Iran," she said, "as Jews, we operated within the limits of the society. But in the U.S., things became different, in the sense that the practice of Judaism involved redefining, reconfiguring and reshaping the boundaries of religious behaviour in a new setting."

I asked Hakakian what she thinks of interfaith relations. The issue in Iran, Hakakian said, was the matter of existence for a minority, a question of continuity in an unfriendly majority, while in the United States, it is quite the opposite. Hakakian said that Jews in the United States do not feel they are a threatened minority and that in Iran it is a matter of ensuring the continuity of a community. Moreover, Hakakian believes that in the United States, Jews do not tend to feel that the majority threaten them and that, whether rightly or wrongly, Jews in the United States feel at home.

'The current movement for democracy in Iran is strong, but the extent of brutality by the Islamic regime far outweighs that of the Shah's'

Hakakian's deep attachment to her Persian roots is demonstrated by her love of modern Persian poetry and by her passion for the struggle for democracy and women's rights. She said she owes much of who she is today to modern Persian poetry and art.

Looking at current events in Iran, particularly the recent post-election turmoil, Hakakian said that one should not be Iranian to care about what is happening there. She sees current developments as the continuation of what happened in 1979 and remains impressed that today's Iran has entered the cultural psyche of people in the West. This is demonstrated by the widespread expression of support for protesters by literary figures, movie and music stars, and many intellectuals in the West. Hakakian also believes the women's movement in Iran is one of the strongest in the developing world. She said that in the course of election campaigns, Iranian women defined the tensions and set the stage for the post-election clashes with security forces.

On the subject of future prospects of democracy in Iran, Hakakian, describing herself as a wishful thinker, said that Iran is heading to a good place, but the road may be bloody. She said that the current movement for democracy in Iran is strong, but the extent of brutality by the Islamic regime far outweighs that of the Shah's.

The current regime, according to Hakakian, is escalating the level of violence and is not remorseful, and does not look to make any compromise, as opposed to Shah's. (The Shah was Iran's monarch until his overthrow by the Iranian Revolution in 1979.) She said that in their demands for social justice and democracy, Iranians today are far more mature and a lot more enlightened and egalitarian, but the question is how long this will take to succeed. She stressed that outside co-operation and help is crucial, and that the international community has to declare a position of solidarity with Iran and strengthen the hand of the movement.

On the highly sensitive and much-publicized issue of rape of Iranian democracy protesters in prison, Hakakian characterized this as the regime's declaration of civil war on ordinary Iranians. She said that the act of rape is the fundamental cornerstone of brutality in any war. "It is a pre-historic act, and I think this is the way by which the Islamic regime in Iran has waged war on its own people. The Shah's army would not even think of committing such acts," she said.

Hakakian continues to have a hectic schedule. Among her many engagements is her upcoming appearance as the guest speaker at ISEF (International Sephardic Education Foundation, www.isef.org) annual women's luncheon. The foundation opens the doors to higher education for capable Israelis from underserved communities. It supports 800 university and college scholars in Israel, from the BA level to postdoctoral research. ISEF also sponsors education projects that empower 3,400 school-age youngsters in Israel's marginalized communities to succeed in school.

Hakakian said that she is working on a book about the assassination of Iranian dissidents in Europe in the 1990s by the Iranian government.

A misguided mission

He no longer attends services, even on Yom Kippur. Instead, he marks the day by reading to himself a selection of the sins that are part of the liturgy. Confessions before the god Me? But he's rich and spends much of his money promoting Jewish scholarship. Therefore, he has been made welcome in many universities that teach Judaism and need funding. Last month he was an honoured guest at the World Congress of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Felix Posen was born into an Orthodox family in Germany that left for safer shores shortly before World War II. He lived in New York and now resides in London. According to newspaper reports, he made his money in oil, metal, minerals and coal before he became something of an apostle of what he terms secular Judaism.

He's opposed to conventional expressions of faith but, like many so-called secular Jews, fighting anti-Semitism seems to be something of a surrogate religion. Combining passion with philanthropy, he has poured money into the Centre for the Study of anti-Semitism at the Hebrew University.

Though he accepts that religion is a component of Jewish culture, it's faithless Jewish education that he promotes. Ironically, to further his goal he seems to imitate the kind of scant instruction that's currently on offer in synagogues and which he decries, by believing that you can teach Judaism without having to practise it. Like the system he denigrates he, too, seems to confuse teaching about Judaism with instruction in living as a Jew.

At least in synagogue religion schools, the potential for such living is available to students, but it's not really possible to live the abstraction that's Jewish culture. The type of education Posen supports cannot be transmitted to future generations, not even in Israel.

He's being lionized in many places not only because of the ubiquitous need for money and respect for its owners, but also as a symptom of the search for novel ways of being Jewish that ranges from New Age "spirituality" to secular "culture" and is often laced with atheism.

Sadly, therefore, though Posen is genuinely trying to provide remedies for the malaise of Jewish ignorance, his efforts may only contribute to it, despite the learned papers recipients of his grants will deliver and the impressive curricula of the day schools he wants to build.

Canadian Jewry is the fourth largest in the world. Should the finances of the Posen Foundation recover after reputed recent reversals, its misguided mission is bound to target us, too. There's no reason to look forward to it.

A great teacher opens doors

From the moment I heard that the Stratford Festival was mounting Cyrano de Bergerac this season, I decided I had to attend. I then convinced two friends from my minyan to join the reminiscence.

In our 1960s high school careers, we had been involved in a wonderful production of Cyrano, which was burned into my memory like a document in the hard drive of my computer. I was delighted to discover that my high school buddies had similar clear and warm memories from that production over 40 years ago. I even had the original script in my library. The things we save.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

And that begs the question. Of all the lessons taught in a few years of schooling, what determines what we retain? And of what we do remember, what good has it served? Note that I write of lessons taught, not lessons learned. There is a vast divide between those two realms of education. Teachers teach all day, but students only learn a small fraction of what is aimed at them.

We can roughly calculate all the hours we spent in the classrooms of our youth, and sadly count the relatively few lessons we truly remember, those we have integrated into our minds and souls, and those that served us well in improving our lives and those of others. The difference is usually an outstanding teacher; a person who has deep knowledge in a given discipline, a love of teaching, care for and confidence in one's students, and enough creative imagination to make every lesson fresh for both teacher and learner. Subject matter is, of course, important, but the actual stuff we learn is barely significant compared to the guide and mentor who takes us through it.

So the week that I saw Cyrano at Stratford with high school buddies I also lost my mentor, Rabbi Joseph Lukinsky z"l, and one of my first supervisors, Pearl Goldberg z"l. And Cyrano made me remember my favourite high school teacher, Rita Ubriaco, of blessed memory, the director of our drama club and the woman who is mostly responsible for my preference of Latin and English over math and science.

Rabbi Lukinsky was one of the top Harvard University PhD's in education, having written a thesis the faculty never forgot, but until our relationship permitted "Joe" as his name, I preferred to call him "Rabbi" rather than "Doctor" or "Professor." He was truly my Rav and taught me not only lessons of the mind and heart, but also how to blend those learnings into a synthesis of everyday living.

Pearl was taken from us in a tragic accident, her death a shock not easily resolved. At her funeral, the rabbi spoke of her elegance and had the insight that elegance is a matter of restraint – knowing when to say yes with a full heart, but also having the control to utter no when situations required it. As a young teacher so inspired by Rabbi Lukinsky's creative push, I often needed to hear Pearl's gentle no in those first years at United Synagogue Day School.

Teachers make all the difference. I have a corresponding negative memory of a music teacher who wouldn't allow me to sing out loud with our class choir and insisted that I merely mouth the words. No doubt, she caught the fact that rhythm is not natural to me and that I change keys every time I take a breath. But she also prevented me from enjoying music and learning more in that beautiful realm until I grew out of her insult to my soul.

Thank God, the positive lessons I learned from all of the wonderful teachers I had far outweighed the poor teachings of a few weaker specimens. Nevertheless, it is important to note that a great teacher opens doors and windows to vast rooms and endless vistas that remain with us a lifetime, while the lesser variety can cut a route short that might well have been the highway of our life.

Teaching is truly the oldest and most noble profession. May the memories of teachers past become the blessings of lives lived to the fullest.

Burdened by responsibility

When I was a child, the principal of my school would walk onto the school bus moments before it was to depart for a class trip. Walking up the aisle, he would seek eye contact with each student. Then he would deliver a sober talk: wherever we were bound, we were to behave with utmost propriety – no high jinks, no rowdiness, nothing that others might interpret negatively. As students of a Jewish school, he explained, we were visible representatives of the Jewish People. At museums, sporting events, field trips, concerts – anything untoward would reflect badly not only on us but on the entire Jewish nation. It would be not simply bad form, he adjured us, but a chillul HaShem, the desecration of God's sacred name. Then he would fix his eyes on each student and descend from the bus, and we would be on our way.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I can't say that no one ever stepped out of line on class trips, but our principal's admonition created a certain aura that never lifted, even during the momentary missteps. We were responsible for the Jewish People. Our lapses in behaviour would trigger anti-Semitism, because – young as we were – we stood for the whole.

What a burden to lay upon children – to be answerable not only for their behaviour, but for the misguided attitudes of random onlookers; answerable not only to principal and parents, but to all Jews everywhere, and to God.

I had not thought about those class trips in many years. But lately I found myself musing backwards. The image of Jews circulating in the media has taken some hard hits recently. The parade of Jewish faces in our daily news, arrested, arraigned, or convicted of shocking misdeeds, reflects, as my former principal would have said, on all of us. These are not simply faces of people who happen to be Jewish, but people who strongly identify as such, using their links to Jewish institutions – even the institutions themselves – to commit terrible crimes.

These faces in the news – of the investment financier who defrauded philanthropic organizations of their holdings and retirees of their life savings; the money launderers using synagogues and yeshivot; the rabbis trafficking in human organs – connect with recurrent images that are the standard stuff of anti-Semitism. They trigger negative thoughts about Jews generally, seemingly giving credence to some of the most pernicious stereotypes about Jews.

One of the darkest and most persistent anti-Semitic fantasies is that Jews murder gentile children and make ritual use of their blood. This outrageous accusation – known as the blood libel – was used for centuries to justify the murder of Jews in pogroms in Europe. Chillingly, it still circulates globally on anti-Semitic websites and other venues. This old and terrible image has been given new play with Donald Boström's article in the Swedish newspaper Aftonbladet, claiming that the Israeli army killed Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank in order to harvest their organs for black market sales.

Jewish communities, the Israeli government, responsible journalists and others have reacted strongly against the Aftonbladet article, rightly seeing it as a revival of a classic and ferocious anti-Semitic trope. As it did historically, such an accusation gives perpetrators seeming justification for acts against Jews. Boström admittedly cannot prove his allegations. However, his article draws a link with the New Jersey rabbis' illicit organ business, anchoring anti-Semitic fantasy in a kernel of unrelated fact. Such are the tactics of prejudice.

Anti-Semitism is neither the creation nor the fault of individual Jews who do wrong. To suggest otherwise places the blame on the victims, rather than the perpetrators. At the end of the day, we are all individuals, answerable for ourselves alone. More than that is an unfair burden.

And yet, at the same time, the outer profession of piety or identity or humanity brings with it special responsibilities, fair or not. As children, we were weighted by this special answerability, and many of us weight our children similarly. Heavy as it may feel, it is right that we do so – as Jews, as Canadians, as humans.

The Kirshner File

The Jewish revival in Poland

The historic events of 1989, during which Poland embraced democracy and shucked off four decades of communism, not only transformed geopolitical realities in central Europe and the then-Soviet Union, but profoundly affected its once illustrious Jewish community.

"Nineteen eighty-nine was the great miracle," Michael Schudrich, the chief rabbi of Poland, said in an interview in Warsaw recently. "Poland regained its freedom, and suddenly, people were living in a free, democratic country."

Sheldon Kirshner in Warsaw

The subtle and blatant totalitarian constraints that had hampered the growth of a normal Jewish community in Poland since the catastrophic events of the Holocaust fell away, explained Rabbi Schudrich, an American of Polish ancestry who has held his position since 2004. "There is a real Jewish community here today, whereas under communism it was monitored and controlled."

With the flowering of democracy in Poland, a nation that has been cruelly partitioned and occupied throughout its tortuous history, the green shoots of a Jewish renaissance have sprouted. "It's a genuine, though limited, revival," explained Stanislaw Krajewski, a Warsaw University philosopher and a former board member of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland. "Compared to the 1980s, I see a huge expansion of Jewish life here."

Rabbi Michael Schudrich

Thanks to the support of such bodies as the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture, the American Joint Distribution Committee, the Jewish Agency, the World Zionist Organization and the Warsaw-based Shalom Foundation, synagogues, Jewish day schools, youth clubs and summer camps are flourishing.

"The Jewish rebirth would be less vibrant without outside financing," said Konstanty Gebert, the director of the Taube Foundation. "The Jewish community is still not self-supporting."

And in a startling process of de-assimilation, some Jews who formerly concealed their Jewish identity, much like Marranos in the wake of the Spanish Inquisition, are no longer afraid to say openly and unequivocally, "I am Jewish."

But Rabbi Shalom Stambler, the Israeli-born Chabad-Lubavitch representative in Warsaw, pointed out that still other Jews in Poland grapple with what he describes as "an identity crisis" and are thus reluctant to declare themselves Jewish.

"There was trouble here for too long a time," he said in an implicit reference to the Holocaust era, the immediate postwar pogroms and the 1968 state-supported anti-Semitic campaign, which prompted thousands of thoroughly secular and Polonized Jews to emigrate. "These things don't go away so easily. The past can't be forgotten."

In a revealing comment, he added, "For every Jew in Poland, there are several Jews who keep their identity secret."

By way of example, he told a story of an old Jew in a village he met who had not even informed his own son that he is Jewish.

These cases notwithstanding, there is a small class of assimilated Jews who do not bother hiding their identity but who have no interest whatsoever in formally identifying with the Jewish community, noted Krajewski. "They are Jews by origin only," he said.

Stanislaw Krajewski

He cited a few examples: the journalist and Solidarity union activist Adam Michnik; the former foreign ministers Adam Rotfeld, Bronislaw Geremek and Stefan Meller; the former head of the foreign relations committee in parliament, Czeslaw Bielecki, and Poland's greatest athlete of the 20th century, Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinska, the sprinter who broke six world records and won seven Olympic Games medals.

That these highly placed Poles of Jewish ancestry have not taken part in Poland's Jewish reawakening is of no concern to Krajewski, whose father, a committed Communist, was a "non-Jewish Jew" himself.

What really concerns him is that a lot of ordinary Poles of Jewish descent did not declare themselves Jewish after the bloodless 1989 revolution.

As he put it, "I thought that many more Poles with Jewish roots would join the community. Some have done so, but many have not and this is a source of frustration. I was more optimistic about this."

Poland, before the Holocaust, had a Jewish population of about 3.3 million. Recognized as a national minority after Poland's independence in 1918, the Polish Jewish community could trace its origins back to at least the 13th century. In terms of size, it was outranked by only the United States.

But with nine out of 10 Polish Jews having been murdered between 1939 and 1945, and with the departure of the majority of the 300,000 survivors during the postwar period, a once venerable community rich in tradition and accomplishment was reduced to a rump.

Rabbi Shalom Stambler

Twenty years after the Communists ceded power to Solidarity, there is no absolute way of ascertaining how many Jews live in Poland today.

"The numbers vary from 12,000 to 20,000," said Rabbi Stambler. "But I'm sure there are many more Jews than official figures suggest."

"Affiliated membership does not exceed 5,000 in 12 functioning communities," observed Krajewski. "Add to that 10,000 non-registered Jews. These are rough guesses."

In Rabbi Schudrich's opinion, Poland has anywhere from 20,000 to 50,000 Jews. "It's probably even higher."

Gebert, who is also a journalist, author and former Solidarity activist, believes that the Jewish revival has reached its peak.

"Thousands of hidden Jews crept out of the woodwork after 1989, but Jewish institutions were unable to respond to them. Most of them, after experimenting with being Jewish and satisfying their curiosity, returned to their Polish identity, though some are still vaguely connected to the Jewish community."

By his estimation, the organized Jewish community consists of roughly 8,000 people. "That means there are more Buddhists than Jews in Poland," he said. Gebert, however, cannot be sure what the actual figure may be. Citing the estimate of a government minister, he said that the real figure may be 15,000. He has also heard that there are 25,000 Poles with Jewish grandparents in Poland today. But in a nation of 38 million inhabitants, the Jews are a drop in an ocean, a tiny but historically important minority.

Konstanty Geber [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

Realistically, observers here do not expect the Jewish community to grow significantly. "It will remain small," said Rabbi Stambler. "Maybe it will double or triple in size."

"It will be a pale imitation of the pre-1939 community, but so what?" said Rabbi Schudrich. Calling attention to the high incidence of mixed marriages, Krajewski pointed out that a marriage between two Jews is an exception in contemporary Poland. "It's very rare to find a married couple where both people are Jewish," said Rabbi Stambler.

To Rabbi Schudrich, the future of the current revival will depend on Poland's political stability, the strength of its economy and the rate of emigration.

Rabbi Stambler said that departures to Israel and other destinations should be expected. "Jews who take their Jewishness seriously usually leave Poland," he said.

All agree that the Polish government has definitely encouraged the rebirth.

"Poland is very positive about it," said Rabbi Stambler. "Poland is excited and supportive that there are Jews here," said Rabbi Schudrich. "I'm sure there are political benefits in that."

According to Gebert, there is a national consensus, from left to right, that Poland should have a thriving Jewish community after the disasters of the 20th century.

You have probably heard about the success that investors in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF) have had. Like consistent annual returns, even in 2008 when so many investments lost money. The RMIF has never failed to pay investors their monthly income.

Let's face it, stock market investments can be risky and volatile. For many people it makes sense to include a fixed income component like the RMIF, Canada's largest private mortgage fund. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Clergy killers

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

First let me say that this is not a book review of Dr. G. Lloyd Rediger's book by the same title as this column. And I should also establish that the reason this is not so is definitely not that this book is lacking in any way – no, it is an excellent piece. Nor is it because the book deals with this subject within the confines of Christianity. No again.

There is a Yiddish saying that, if not already well known, should be made known. "Vie es kristal zich. Yidel zich." A rough translation is: "The same that prevails among the gentiles will prevail among the Jews."

Yes, I know that this is a Sephardi column and therefore has no business quoting a Yiddish expression. The fact remains that the human experience is such that the mores of the general society will percolate and eventually permeate a particular society, no matter how insular it may attempt to make itself. For instance, if divorce rates are on the rise, a similar course will soon follow suit among the Jews.

But I digress and will get back to my starting point: clergy killers – who, what and why?

If I may take some quotes from the book's author: "These congregants take advantage of the church [here, please substitute synagogue, shul, temple] to work out feelings of impotence and low self-esteem. Subconsciously, they believe that if they put down the minister [again please substitute rebbe, rabbi, rov, etc.] in the eyes of the congregation, they will be raising their own standing. So they spread rumours about his private life or make false accusations about his professional ability or conduct. They get elected to serve in committees for the sole purpose of blocking any initiatives stemming from the clergy. And often they will work behind the scene to have him fired outright.

"Frequently they succeed in making his job and life so difficult that he simply is left with no choice but to move on to another congregation."

Now, I know that neither you nor I are so naïve that we will react to these lines with dismay. Everyone in communal life has seen this pathetic scenario play itself out. Indeed, I will venture to say that there exists not even one single individual who doesn't personally know a clergy killer.

During these days of tshuvah, Mianonadies' analytical text on this very subject is basic and required reading. Chapter 4 especially focuses on the topic of clergy killers, and it does so repeatedly. Elsewhere, these clergy killers are reassessed and their label of clergy killers is succeeded by that of "congregational killers," for such is the fallout that results from the work of these schemers and the collateral damage that ensues.

May I propose that, in a final analysis of this pathology, these clergy killers cum congregational killers could be further assessed, at which point the title "God killers," no less, could be conferred upon them – yes deicide. For when they divest themselves and their congregation of religious leadership, either through outright termination – or as usually happens – through neutralizing the clergy in his scope of influence vis à vis the congregation at large, Godliness itself is the casualty. An entire congregation's connection to God through their clergy is extinguished. God gradually becomes irrelevant in the lives of the congregation, as it will in the lives of the children of this congregation and all succeeding generations.

Beware of clergy killers!

Where have the Canadians gone?

The CJN recently reported on five young Canadians who received Wexner Graduate Fellowships. The fellowship is designed to enable a select group of aspiring Jewish professionals to engage in full-time study leading toward careers in the rabbinate, Jewish education, Jewish professional leadership or academic Jewish studies. What is most remarkable about this year's class is the prevalence of Canadians. Five of the 20 fellows, a quarter of the class, are Canadian.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

It's not only in the Wexner Fellowship that Canadians are disproportionally represented. Last year, a third of the students in the Hornstein graduate program in Jewish communal service at Brandeis University were Canadians, and there is similarly skewed representation of Canadians in a variety of rabbinical schools and Jewish studies programs across America.

The trend speaks to the tremendous success of our education system. Young Canadians are interested in Jewish studies and communal service. We are fortunate that our community has fostered a culture where being a teacher or rabbi, federation executive or camp director does not hold the negative stigma found in some corners, but rather these professions are treated with respect and even reverence. High engagement rates of day schools, summer camps and other educational programs expose our youth to professionals who model a passion for their work and a commitment to community that filters into their students' professional lives. I know that many of the reasons for my own career as a Jewish educator were my mentors both inside and out of the classroom.

It is understandable, and in may ways important, that our future leaders spend time studying in America. Notwithstanding strong programs in Jewish studies at many Canadian universities and programs specifically in Jewish education at York University and McGill University, we do not offer programs in rabbinical studies or communal service to train the future leaders of our community. By studying in America, our future rabbis and educators glean valuable lessons from communities abroad that they can bring back to Canada, and they are given the opportunity to study from the masters of their field in some of the richest Jewish settings available. Opportunities such as these would never be available in similar programs in Canada.

My concern, however, is that these young leaders don't come back. Time after time, I attend conferences on Jewish education populated by Canadians working in America. After studying in the United States, many find lucrative jobs and continue their career south of the border. Many of these ex-pats have told me that they want to come back to Canada but have difficulty finding appropriate jobs or the right "fit" in the Canadian community. We are experiencing a brain drain of the best and brightest of our professional Jewish minds.

Few initiatives have been designed to stem this tide. Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University runs the only program I can identify, offering significant scholarships to Canadian students to study at YU conditional on a commitment to teach in Canada upon graduation. The return on such an investment is a cadre of teachers, fluent in the unique character of Canadian Judaism but with the knowledge and skills of training at a flagship American institute.

It is time to create a "Wexner Fellowship" for Canadians – a fellowship that will allow our best and brightest to hone their skills at the best schools in America, Israel or elsewhere, with a commitment to return to serve the Canadian community.

In addition to funding studies, the fellowship can offer seminars exploring the unique needs of the Canadian community, build a network of future Canadian leaders while facilitating networking with current professional and lay leaders, and assist in job placement upon graduation. Most importantly, it will serve as an investment in building a strong, vibrant and committed Canadian community in the future.

Jewish Life

It's that time of the year again!

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

Summer was fun while it lasted, and the last days of the season trickled away as students primed themselves for university.

Student life is a far cry from the carefree days of summer that are filled with part-time and seasonal jobs. With the break from the difficult routine of studies over, students scrambled back to school and dorms filled up. Some students moved out of their homes for the first time, while others returned to the familiarity of their school campuses. Students are now back to the task of trying to achieve their academic goals.

During the past few years, problems have plagued Jewish students on campuses all over Canada, most notably at York University. For some university students, it won't be the first time that they have experienced hostility on campus. For first-year students, it will be a new experience, one they won't be particularly fond of.

Students who have spent their high school years in Jewish schools are now scattered in various schools across Canada and the United States. At these schools, they have been thrust into new situations. Recently, demonstrations against Israel have been held on most Canadian campuses, and Israeli Apartheid Week has become an annual event. New Jewish students will be forced to deal with these campus events.

My words are not meant as a scare tactic to discourage students who are leaving their homes; they are merely a reminder that these students have a responsibility to combat this hostility and to promote Israel.

I personally encourage students, regardless of which university or college they attend, to seek out the Jewish organizations on their campuses – groups such as Hillel/JSA (Jewish Students Association), Chabad and the Jewish fraternity, Alpha Epsilon Pi.

These groups strive to promote Israel and Judaism. Jewish people are condemned with negative stereotypes by many university groups, such as the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and some student unions. It is imperative for us Jews to unite to combat these stereotypes.

Not only do the Jewish campus groups help to promote a positive image of Israel and its supporters, the groups also help new Jewish students to fit in and to meet other Jewish students from across Canada. The groups set up Shabbat dinners at which every Jewish student is welcome, helping to provide a feeling of Jewish togetherness, which, ultimately, is how we are able to combat the anti-Israel sentiment found on campuses.

Most of these organizations have already started planning for events. Shabbat dinners as well as a few barbecues have been scheduled as the preliminary recruiting by these organizations begins. These events serve as meet-and-greets and bring new students and the leaders of the groups together.

The beginning of the first semester will dictate how well the year will go for these organizations, and if things go well for them, it will help secure a better future for Jewish students on campus.

Challah recipes on the web, Part 2

By Mark Mietkiewicz

Today I continue my look at challah resources on the web. But before I begin, I must address the families of all the bubbes, grandmothers and savtas out there. If your family has been passing a cherished challah recipe from generation to generation, nothing on the Internet could ever come close. However, if you aren't one of the fortunate ones, there is a treasure-trove of recipes out there. And who knows, you may stumble across a recipe that one day your grandchildren will thank you for.

The Jewish-food Challah Archives has more than 50 variations including Honey Whole Wheat, Always Successful and Almost Like Aunt Leah's [tinyurl.com/challah09] Over at the rec.food.cuisine.jewish archives, you'll find Venetian Challah, Apple Challah and Sweet. [tinyurl.com/challah10] But hands-down, the most mouth-watering challah site belongs to tastespotting.com, which includes an incredible photo with each recipe. [tinyurl.com/challah11]

Some people's choice in challahs is limited by their ability to digest wheat gluten. But that doesn't mean they can't enjoy a golden loaf. Here's how the author of the I Am Gluten Free blog describes her find. "At last, a respectable gluten-free challah! How can I even express my delight, my joy, my excitement! And it not only looks good, but it tastes good, too. I found the recipe online and made some changes that I think improved it." [tinyurl.com/challah12]

No challah is complete without the intricate braiding. There are sites that describe how to braid a challah. [tinyurl.com/challah13] But I recommend you watch videos of some experts navigating the twists and turns. Once you've mastered a three-strand loaf, [tinyurl.com/challah14] you're ready to try your hand at the more challenging six-strand variety. [tinyurl.com/challah23]

And then there is the Rosh Hashanah variety, often on the sweet side and dotted with raisins. (Don't get me started on the raisin versus plain debate, a point of some contention my household!) Anyway, the New Year's challah is traditionally wound into a round shape (to symbolize a full year) [tinyurl.com/challah16] or braided to resemble a crown. [tinyurl.com/ challah17]

One of the great mysteries of Judaism is that there actually could be challah left over after the holiday has finished. But if you happen to find yourself with some challah on Sunday morning, there is no shortage of ideas and recipes for what to do with it. Of course, the old standard is Challah French Toast. [tinyurl.com/challah18] Are you looking for an even more decadent way to dispose of your excess challah? Try a White-Chocolate Challah Pudding. Who would ever dream of combining challah with yet more eggs and vanilla extract, heavy cream, milk, sugar and two cups of white chocolate? [tinyurl.com/challah19]

Baking a challah can be time-consuming, but there are recipes that will help speed up the process. [tinyurl.com/ challah20] Others hasten the procedure by taking advantage of bread machines to knead the dough. [tinyurl.com/challah21]

When Shoshanah Zakar bakes a challah, she doesn't focus on speed. Zakar has conducted workshops on baking challahs, and hers is one of the best sites for delivering the nitty-gritty. But Zakar's site goes much further when she describes the baking of challah as much more than simply mixing and kneading and baking. [tinyurl.com/challah22]

"There is a recipe that tells you the ingredients and mixing instructions for making challah. If you follow it, you will likely come up with a good loaf of challah, but that is not the real point… If you prepare the loaves with the intention of doing it for the sake of God, of doing it as a mitzvah, that will help make the Shabbat meal a blessing, you will end up with Shabbat Challot. You will find yourself bound up in the twists of their meaning, and a greater sense of the power and holiness of Shabbat. The time you spend making challah is a good time to pray, to allow yourself to explore the "deeper meanings" hidden within the process, and to become more aware of God's presence."

An inconvenient truth about day schools

By SHIRA DICKER

Guest Voice

A friend called recently to tell me that she and her husband had withdrawn their daughter from Jewish day school because they could no longer afford the $30,000 yearly tuition.

An artist married to a semi-employed lawyer, my friend sounded regretful yet resolved to do what was best for her family. My response was an emphatic affirmation that she was indeed acting in the best interest of her family – and her own sanity.

I speak from a position of great authority, having chosen the exact opposite course of action over the past 25 years.

Now that the economy has crumbled and a critical mass of people are newly broke and worried, I am inspired to "out" myself as a committed Jew who has spent the past quarter century being broke and worried, forced into a state of financial struggle and work-related stress due to the high cost (and high-priced accoutrements) of being Jewish in a major metropolitan area.

And – as has been documented in the pages of this newspaper as well as other venues – the biggest cause of this distress has been the steadily mounting price of Jewish day school, which my husband and I provided for our three children, a commitment that absolved us not of luxury items, but of basic necessities.

After more than two decades of living under the cloud of financial anxiety, it comes as a huge relief to hear someone else suddenly proclaiming day school tuition unaffordable. Indeed, the non-sustainability of the high-tuition Jewish day school model has become the new mantra of the Jewish community.

Yet until this moment, I kept my counsel, marvelling at how easily so many others seemed to be providing this basic Jewish amenity for their kids, loathe to be dubbed a kvetch or a bad Jew. Nor would I want inadequate salaries for day school educators. So I bit my tongue and signed cheques. I bartered when I was able. I took on additional commitments. I deferred the dream I had nurtured since childhood and pursued a professional path where I was certain to make a higher income. I put off my plan of returning to graduate school until such a time that my family would be able to do without my income, never mind the cost of my own tuition.

Although I felt isolated, I wasn't really alone. There were others like me, and we kvetched to each other along the way. Many of us are writers or in creative yet modest-paying professions. Some of us applied for and received scholarship assistance. Until my husband and I stopped filling out the humiliating and intrusive forms several years ago, we were among that group.

But even with a few thousand dollars lopped off the total cost of tuition, Jewish day school in New York City is astronomical. With this kind of steady expenditure over the course of six or eight or 12 years – per child – it is difficult if not impossible to save for college.

Then again, conditioned to have a revolving-door chequing account, the trauma of college tuition often just feels like more of the same.

But the problematic price tag of Jewish education was enabled by a culture of affluence that somehow got tangled up with American Jewish identity. My unscientific observation is that this culture took root in the early 1980s and grew wildly in the intervening decades, subverting the teaching of the Ethics of the Fathers: "Who is successful? He who makes tons of money and has lots of stuff."

Within this culture of affluence, there was a distinct shame associated with financial struggle, a belief that not having enough money indicated some kind of existential failure. After a brief eternity of being a have-not in a land of haves, it is startling for me to suddenly hear the phrase, "I cannot afford..."

For the last quarter century, those who were committed yet couldn't afford the high price of being Jewish were bullied or shamed into silence or compliance. That reality changed, nearly overnight, and I view the defection of Jewish families from the day school system as an important wake-up call, a reaction to the myth that if Jewish education is a priority, families will always find a way to finance it.

Still, I am wondering why it took so long for a simple truth to be articulated. And now that I am no longer a solitary voice keening into the night, I am emboldened to state another truth: though I am a passionate proponent of the incredible spiritual incubator that is the modern Jewish day school – indeed, my youngest son is entering ninth grade at SAR High School in Riverdale, N.Y. – I still do not want my own children to endure what I have when they become parents.

Because such a sacrifice leaves the taste of ashes in your mouth.

'The greatest lesson of past is not to wait until it's too late'

By MOSHE KANTOR

On the 70th anniversary of the outbreak of World War II, the European Jewish Congress is remembering both the evil and tyranny of the Nazis and their collaborators and the bravery and fortitude of the Allies that fought and defeated them.

Moshe Kantor

Guest Voice

Seventy years later we are witnessing a similar spectre of tyranny over parts of the world as the Iranian regime exports its fanaticism and culture of death around the world.

This, while oppressing its own people and most importantly building a nuclear weapons program that can threaten its neighbours, parts of Europe and moving its range menacingly further and further.

World War II resulted in the death of tens of millions of civilians, including six million Jews, and sent the European continent into a bloodbath for the ensuing six years.

The European Jewish Congress – the democratically elected representative body of European Jewish communities – remembers the heroism of those who lead the fight against tyranny that cast a dark shadow over the continent.

Although the two regimes and eras are markedly different, the European Jewish Congress has called on the international community to take a firm stand on the issues of similarities between the two.

We now know that much of the bloodshed that began in September 1939 could have been avoided if some leaders had taken the Nazis at their word. So too we see people dismiss Iranian leaders when they call for the destruction of other nations and a call for regional and international hegemony.

Just like the Nazi military campaigns were predated by a putsch and brutal excesses against its own people, so too we see the Iranian regime steal power and crush any rebellion or differences in its nation.

The European Jewish Congress is calling on European governments to act now to prevent a repeat of the mistakes of the past and thwart a catastrophe in the making.

The greatest lesson of the past is not to wait until it's too late because the cost is always far greater than taking no action.

The clock is ticking and all that remains to be seen is how people decades in the future will judge our actions when they count the cost of inaction and procrastination. This is a critical point in time and will determine the world in which we live.

Moshe Kantor is the president of the World Jewish Congress

We now know that much of the bloodshed that began in September 1939 could have been avoided if some leaders had taken the Nazis at their word

Toronto shuls welcome new clergy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The past few months have been a time of change for more than half a dozen Toronto-area congregations, as new clergy replaced others who have retired or left their congregations. A roundup of new and – in some cases – familiar faces, follows.

Cantor Alex Stein, Adath Israel Congregation

Adath Israel welcomed Alex Stein as senior cantor Aug. 1. His predecessor, Eli Kirshblum, retired earlier this year after 42 years with the synagogue.

Cantor Alex Stein

Cantor Stein, a 36-year-old native of Sydney, Australia, served Calgary's Beth Tzedec Congregation, the largest synagogue in western Canada, for the past seven years. A lyric tenor who began his professional career at age 17, Stein has three CDs to his name, including a live recording of himself and cantors Shimon Farkas and Yaakov Motzen performing in a 2007 concert with Marvin Hamlisch and the Calgary Philharmonic.

Rabbi Leslie Lipson, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue

Rabbi Leslie Lipson, who was ordained in 1998 by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), is Beth Emeth's new associate rabbi. A former rabbi at two congregations in New Jersey (Marlboro and then Rockaway), he served most recently as upper school dean of Jewish studies and Jewish life at the San Diego Jewish Academy. Rabbi Lipson, 44, grew up in Rochester, N.Y., and spent 10 summers at Camp Ramah in Ontario, as a camper and then a staff member. He has an MBA from York University and a master's of education degree from JTS. He expects to do "a lot of outreach" both within and outside the Beth Emeth community.

Rabbi Leslie Lipson

Rabbi Jarrod Grover, Beth Tikvah Synagogue

Beth Tikvah has a new assistant rabbi as of July. Rabbi Jarrod Grover, 27, is a recent graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary. The Montreal native, who also has a BA in economics from Princeton University, will serve as a teacher and resource for youth and young families, and assist Rabbi Wayne Allen with teaching and pastoral care.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover

Rabbi Adam Cutler, Beth Tzedec Congregation

Rabbi Adam Cutler

Toronto native Rabbi Adam Cutler, 27, was ordained this year by the Jewish Theological Seminary. On Aug. 1, he joined Beth Tzedec's senior rabbi, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, and Rabbi Harvey Meirovich, who is here from Israel and beginning a second year at the shul, as part of the rabbinic team. Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum retired earlier this year.

Rabbi Cutler is a longtime "Ramahnik," and was a co-founder of the Varsity Jews a capella choir. A graduate of the University of Toronto, he studied political science and Near and Middle Eastern civilizations following a year at Bar-Ilan University. He is also an alumnus of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and Associated Hebrew Schools. At Beth Tzedec, in addition to general rabbinic responsibilities, he serves the synagogue's youth, from small children to young professionals.

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky, Congregation B'nai Torah

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky, 39, was born in Toronto, but grew up in Mexico City and Jerusalem, where his father was a pulpit rabbi and educator, respectively. An alumnus of the Telshe Yeshiva of Chicago, Rabbi Milevsky has an MA in liberal studies from the University of Memphis. He served as rabbi at Young Israel of Greater Buffalo from 1997 to 2003, and then Young Israel of Memphis for the past six years.

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky, 41, is the new rabbi of Kehillat Shaarei Torah, as of July. Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, who served the congregation for 15 years, has made aliyah.

Rabbi Kanofsky has a PhD in comparative literature from Boston University, where he studied under Elie Wiesel, and he was ordained at the Rabbinical College of America, a Lubavitch institution in Morristown, N.J. He spent the past five years as an educational consultant at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and as volunteer rabbi of the "Jewish Unity Minyan" at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Prior to that, from 2001 to 2004, Rabbi Kanofksy was director of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation in Poland.

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

Rabbi Sean Gorman

Rabbi Sean Gorman, Pride of Israel Synagogue

Rabbi Sean Gorman became Pride of Israel's spiritual leader on July 21. The 39-year-old Brooklyn native and former Pearl Harbor-based U.S. Navy chaplain was part of the rabbinic team at Beth Tzedec from 2005 until this summer. An alumnus of the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he was ordained in 1998, he also has an undergraduate degree in psychology. Before moving to Toronto, he was spiritual leader of the Bellmore Jewish Centre in Long Island, N.Y.

Rabbi Rafi Lipner, Shaarei Tefillah Congregation

Shaarei Tefillah recently hired Rabbi Rafi Lipner, 35, as young families co-ordinator on a three-year contract. Rabbi Lipner – a Toronto native with a BA in economics, a master's degree in Jewish education, and smichah from Yeshiva University – continues as director of The House, a place that offers educational events and programs to young Jews from all backgrounds, and as a teacher of Jewish studies at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

At Shaarei Tefillah, he is developing and running a new program for young couples, including breakout classes on Shabbat mornings, home study groups and young children's programming.

Byelection set for Sept. 17

The CJN: During the 2007 provincial election, members of the Jewish community and others raised the issue of equitable funding for faith-based schools. Where do you stand on this?

Levy: "The issue is dead, because the voters spoke loud and clear on this in the last election. But I'm a strong advocate of a good, solid, publicly funded system, and I would be very happy to look into things to improve it, public or private. I know the issues around private schools not being permitted to participate in some of the publicly funded programs… and I think that should be looked into."

Heller: "This is not the time to be talking about one school board versus another. It is the time to be investing and restoring funding to all our schools so that they have music teachers, full-time librarians, gym teachers… because this McGuinty government, after promising to fix the funding in 2003, six years later has done nothing to change the funding formula."

Chopik: "The Green stance is that funding for schools should be universal. The Catholic school system comes with a problematic depth. It's been around for a long time and we're sort of stuck with it. I'm not a subject-matter expert on education… generally speaking, our policy is that education should be treated in a universal way. Everybody should be receiving the same access and benefits."

Hoskins: "I think it's unfortunate that the issue of funding to faith-based schools became a lightning rod in the last [provincial] election. I think it set back the discussion and the debate by about 15 years. It's important that discussion continue. I've met with [the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee], the Canadian Jewish Congress and a lot of leaders and rabbis in the Jewish community over the past weeks, and have had the opportunity to gain a fulsome understanding of issues of specific concern to the Jewish community in the riding, this being one of them."

The CJN: Is there anything you'd like to say specifically to the approximately 15,000 Jewish residents of St. Paul's?

Levy: "My wife and I are very strong on Israel, as is [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper. With the rise in anti-Semitism in Toronto and Canada, the fact that we have a prime minister that is so pro-Israel makes me feel very good. I can't stress enough… that the Jewish community have a critical voice inside Queen's Park, whether it be [on] taxation, Jewish issues or gay rights issues."

Heller: "As a member of the Jewish community in St. Paul's… I understand the needs and concerns of the local community. We share the concerns over schools, transit and health and government accountability. In addition, we come with a unique perspective and pride in our particular cultural community. So I understand where [Jews] are coming from and am committed to serving that community, as well as other communities in the riding."

Chopik: "[God] is represented in nature. And there is, I believe, a strong impetus for observant [Jews] to pay attention to the changes that are happening in our natural environment and to take personal action, where possible, to protect that environment."

Hoskins: "I want [the Jewish community] to know that [fair funding for faith-based schools] is an issue I want to discuss very seriously going forward. And if the good people of St. Paul's see fit to elect me, I hope we can make some progress on this."

Ve'ahavta connects with the homeless

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Jacqueline Stein normally never leaves home without her hair styled, makeup done and designer gold purse in hand. She is writing a book about fashion and feminism and takes pride in her appearance. But for three days this summer, Stein abandoned materialism to take part in an initiative that found her living among Toronto's homeless.

From Aug. 26 to 28, Stein joined Ve'ahavta founder Avrum Rosensweig in his mission to live on the streets and spend time with the less fortunate members of our community.

"The initiative was really a trek or a journey that was sponsored by Ve'ahavta, the humanitarian and relief organization. The idea was for myself and three of my colleagues to go out into the streets and come to the homeless.

"We were not purporting to be homeless or pretending to be homeless. We simply wanted to hear their stories and share their stories with others," said Rosensweig.

"It's not only the stories of grief and abuse, it's the stories of the magic that lie inside them," he said. "Some of them are poets and some of them are writers or artists.

"If we have the ability to share those stories with the people we call "homefull," then maybe in some way that might de-marginalize the homeless. It might make people understand that when you walk by a grate somewhere on Queen Street, or when you walk by a shelter, that person you're looking down upon is somebody's kid or parent. They're human just like you and I, and we tend to forget that."

Led by Theresa Schrader, a former prostitute and crack addict who was once homeless, Rosensweig and his team became exposed to the harsh realities of society's penniless victims. Schrader, who has a two-year-old son and now lives in a subsidized apartment, recently changed her life with Ve'ahavta's influence.

"There have been very distinct moments that have contributed to building my self-esteem through Ve'ahavta, including winning their creative writing contest in 2005," said Schrader.

"It's a privilege for me to be with them, acting as their tour guide on the streets. To actually be traveling and interacting more is so rewarding for me because I now have a message of hope. If I can change, anyone can change, and I really want to plant a seed in people that change is possible."

The three-day initiative included a drum circle at Trinity Bellwoods Park, where a circle of honesty was created by Ve'ahavta to encourage the homeless to share their narratives, a barbecue lunch at Evangel Hall, a Shabbat dinner at Anshei Minsk Congregation and a memorial service at Trinity Square for those who have perished on the streets.

Alvaro Castellanos, who accompanied Rosensweig on his mission and spent a night in a shelter with Stein, said the most meaningful part of the initiative was bringing light to a world of darkness. "We can sleep where they sleep, but it's what we do for them that matters."

Stein, who adopted a homeless mentality while living on the streets, said she has realized that the Jewish community must broaden their reach and acknowledge those who are lacking.

The beginning of something special

"I think, especially in Toronto where there is so much wealth, that there is a divide between those who have and those who don't have," she said. "I think there needs to be a bridge that we build together that shows we're all human beings and we all want things in life.

"Some of us were born into wealth, some of us were not, but we all need the same things – love, health and support. I think we need to support those who have not had the support that they've so justly needed."

Stein said this support system was hard to accomplish in a matter of days, but based on the time that Ve'ahavta had, they were able to establish a relationship and connection with the homeless that will hopefully go forward.

"The conclusion that I've drawn is one singular thing," said Rosensweig. "We need to learn how to love better. We need to learn how to love ourselves better, then the people who are closest to us, and then to extend outwardly to the rest of the world. There seems to be a disconnect between what we think we should be doing and what we're actually doing."

Rosensweig said the initiative is only the pilot program. Community involvement has been limited so far, but he's confident that the effort is the beginning of something special. Ve'ahavta has raised about $10,000 through the project to date, an amount he hopes will continue to grow.

"It's the opening up of people's minds and hearts about the world in which they live – sometimes which is less than a mile away. If we can successfully raise people's consciousness about those individuals who we call homeless, then that in and of itself is a success."

On the street with Avrum Rosensweig. Please see page 75.

YU presence in Toronto offers intensive learning

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto is home to a new beit midrash – in effect, a kolel (a post-yeshiva program for men), with significant community outreach.

Zichron Dov Yeshiva University (YU) Torah Mitzion Beit Midrash, an intensive Torah and Talmud study program based at Clanton Park Synagogue, is an affiliate of YU's Centre for the Jewish Future and Kollel Torah Mitzion, an arm of Mizrachi Canada, the religious Zionist umbrella.

It is named in memory of Bill Rubinstein, the father of Eli Rubinstein, president of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University, who with his wife Renée was the driving force behind its creation.

The beit midrash will serve as a satellite of YU's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS), according to a YU news release. Similar YU Kolels exist in Chicago and Dallas.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, who was ordained at RIETS, is the rosh beit midrash. A 37-year-old father of four with expertise in computers, he is the creator of Webshas, an online index to the Talmud, and a blog called "The Rebbetzin's Husband."

Late last month, he and his family arrived in Toronto from Allentown, PA, where he spent eight years as spiritual leader of Congregation Sons of Israel.

In a recent interview, Rabbi Torczyner told The CJN that the beit midrash plans to hold classes across the city, not just at synagogues but other venues as well.

"It's important to us to see all Jews as one. The distinctions we draw shouldn't prevent us from recognizing we're all Jews, and we all have a stake in Torah," he said.

A core group of four soon-to-be-ordained rabbis constitute the avreichim (a term usually used to describe young men studying at kolels) who study at Clanton Park during the day.

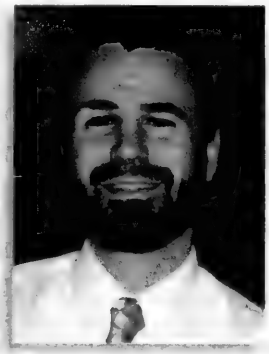
Each of them is involved in a research project, with the goal not only of broadening and deepening their learning, but creating something the community can use, said Rabbi Torczyner.

One project, he said, deals with observations about human nature that work their way into Jewish law, and how Jewish law has dealt with apparent changes in human psychology over time.

"It affects everything from marriage and divorce to the credibility of a litigant in court," he said.

Classes for the community are already being held on some evenings. Women's classes are among the offerings, and Rabbi Torczyner also mentioned co-ed classes, depending on the location and the expectations of the particular community.

Rabbi Torczyner said he intends to offer the same material to all students, men and women – "everything from Talmud and Tanach to Jewish history."



Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner

For now, he and Rabbi Azarya Berzon are teaching all classes. Rabbi Berzon is the kolel's scholar-in-residence for a year, and was a student of Rabbi Joseph Dov Soloveitchik, widely acknowledged as the leading figure in 20th-century Modern Orthodoxy.

"Part of our project is to mentor the others" so that they will be able to teach in the kolel as well, said Rabbi Torczyner, who has been mentoring rabbis for the past three years as part of a formal program.

"This was an extension of that, to me," he said. As well, he noted, the move appealed to him for personal reasons because Allentown, unlike Toronto, has no Jewish high school.

There is no charge for the kolel's services. Funds pledged last year – $2.6 million – provide a stipend for the core students as well as operating costs for the first three years, according to Mo Lidsky, national director of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University.

A public event, to introduce the Beit Midrash to the community, will be held Oct. 25 at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

Hillel helps students discover their Jewishness in India

By Howard English

It was a journey designed to remove students from their comfort zone. And the objective was certainly met.

From July 15 to August 17, this year, students from Hillel of Greater Toronto, supported by UJA Federation, and Hillel students from Israel joined together to participate in an organization first - a volunteer trip to Dharamsala, predominantly populated by Tibetans, on the northern tip of India. There, among other activities, they volunteered at the House of Hope, which cares for nearly 300 children – many of them tsunami orphans, and conducted Jewish educational sessions at a Tibetan children's village.

The program, called Olamot, initiated by Hillel of Greater Toronto, IsraAid: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid and Hillel Israel, was backed by a major grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"In living among the Tibetan people of Dharamsala, volunteering to better the community, and through meeting talented individuals with similar values and ambitions, India has and continues to shape who I am and where I am heading," said participant Tamar Tepper in one of her blogs.

"It's not the scarves or jewellery that substantiates our souls. Rather, it's our first-hand experiences and the friendships that we create within the Tibetan community that imprint upon our lives and change who we are and who we become," noted Shauna Lichtblau in her blog.

Dressed in traditional Tibetan clothes, Hillel students receive a private meeting with the Karmapa, second in command to Dalai Lama.

According to Rebecca Woods Baum, Hillel of Greater Toronto's Director of Immersive Experiences, the Olamot participants never expected to have as much in common as they did with a foreign and completely unfamiliar culture. "It was not just a one-way street. The cultural and interfaith exchange was a huge take-away. We realized we have so much more in common with the Tibetans than we could have ever imagined," she said.

The Dharamsala experience is just one way in which Hillel is attracting students on campus and encouraging them to become more involved in Jewish life. "These immersive programs are so important for Hillel," said Woods Baum. "They take us out of our comfort zone; allow us to focus on our Jewish identity while being educated by other cultures. We had incredible opportunities to perform chesed (acts of kindness) in communities that so need our help. It's amazing." The Olamot initiative also involved volunteer work in Israel before the visit to India, and now that it's all over, what's next? "Spreading the word through grassroots advocacy and sharing stories of meeting astounding people in Israel and India alike," an enthusiastic Woods Baum observed. "It's a great way to demonstrate how far reaching Hillel is and how much it has to offer."

This article was written with the assistance of Leigh Brown.

They are Not Alone on Campus

Year after year, United Jewish Appeal provides a much needed safety net for thousands of vulnerable in Toronto and Israel by lifting them from the challenging circumstances they face, especially during these difficult economic times.

Together with UJA Federation's network of agencies, we are responding to a dramatic rise in services needed to assist those in need, be it the poor, the elderly, new immigrants, or Jewish students on campus.

The following is another in a series of* Jewish Toronto *stories that put a face to the statistics and how UJA is transforming lives, across the street and across the globe.

This past year, the quality of life for Toronto's Jewish students on campus was threatened far too often.

With anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment sweeping across many university campuses, the quality of life for nearly 20,000 Jewish college and university students in Toronto can be challenging. In one case last year, Jewish students were barricaded in the York University Hillel lounge by a mob yelling anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. In response, UJA Federation along with affiliated agencies - the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and Hillel - launched a commission addressing these disturbing incidents. The recommendations, which reflected Jewish community concerns, were recently presented to the York University Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community, which adopted two of them.

UJA Federation is committed to ensuring that York University is a safe and welcoming institution for all students and supports our students in several ways including the following:

- UJA Federation invests $1 million annually in funding for Hillel of Greater Toronto to provide advocacy and Jewish identity programs on campus.
- UJA Federation provides ongoing consultation to Hillel and other Jewish student groups in a variety of areas, in close cooperation with our affiliated agencies.
- UJA Federation and its affiliated organizations provide extensive support on campus to deal with anti-Israel and anti-Semitic activity.

Is Obama sending wrong signals in Mideast?

Two recent newspaper pieces – one in Canada and one in Lebanon – made the same argument: that U.S. President Barack Obama has failed to develop a cohesive, effective policy for the Middle East.

In "Obama's Mideast Vision: Confusion" (Aug. 27) Michael Young, the opinion page editor and columnist for the Beirut-based English-language Daily Star, wrote that Obama's efforts to make America better liked in the Mideast will only serve to make its adversaries more inflexible. "That explains the upsurge of bombings in Iraq lately, and it explains why the Taliban feel no need to surrender anything in Afghanistan."

Young wrote: "Engagement of Iran and Syria has also come up short, though a breakthrough remains possible. However, there was always something counterintuitive in lowering the pressure on Iran in the hope that this would generate progress in finding a solution to its nuclear program.

"By placing most of his chips on engagement, the president has failed to develop a more multifaceted strategy while relinquishing other forms of coercion that could have been effective in Washington's bargaining with the Islamic Republic."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Obama's efforts to engage Syria in an attempt to move it away from Iran shows no sign of succeeding. On the contrary, Syria "has facilitated suicide attacks in Iraq and encouraged Hamas' intransigence in inter-Palestinian negotiations in Cairo."

While Young agrees with Obama's opposition to Israeli settlement growth, he faults the president for placing too much emphasis on it: "Obama is exerting considerable political capital to confront Israel, but it may be capital wasted at a moment when Hamas [backed by Iran and Syria] can still veto any breakthrough from the Palestinian side. In other words, Washington is working on a narrow front, whereas its failure to weaken Hamas may render the whole enterprise meaningless."

Young concluded: "The president is being tied up every which way by his foes, who can plainly see that the Obama vision is an unsystematic one." The result, Young claims, is that the United States is marginalizing itself.

In "Obama's Mideast fumbles disappoint Israel, Arabs" (Winnipeg Free Press, Sept. 1), Mideast correspondent Samuel Segev concurred with Young that "Obama's shotgun approach to the region and his determination to reverse – at any cost – all of former president George W. Bush's policies without a cohesive alternative strategy, have disappointed many of his supporters in the region."

On an emboldened Iran, Segev wrote: "As far as Israel and the moderate Arab countries are concerned, however, there is no more important issue than the need to contain Iran. It's not just Iran's hegemonial ambitions and the nuclear threat to Israel, but also the Iranian support to seditious Sunni groups in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, the Gaza Strip, Morocco, Tunisia and Algeria. All these countries feel that Obama's constant signals that the U.S is eager to leave and go home have created a vacuum that Iran is ready to fill."

Segev also addressed the issue of Iran's determination to develop nuclear weapons. He argued that a recent International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) report on Iran's nuclear program provided indirect confirmation of this aim. This report, Segev wrote, revealed that "Iran is still refusing to turn over important documents related to its military nuclear program. It concluded that if Iran's current stockpile of low-enriched uranium was further purified, Iran could have close to enough for two warheads."

The Globe and Mail is a staunch defender of freedom of speech. But its editorial "Don't blame Sweden" (Sept. 1) failed to understand the seriousness of the anti-Semitic "blood libel" conveyed in the Swedish newspaper Aftonbladet, which alleged that Israeli soldiers have engaged in organ theft from dead Palestinians.

The Globe said that Sweden, like any democratic government, is not "accountable for what is published in free societies." While noting that the piece was shoddy journalism, the Globe nonetheless argued that "not every piece of bad journalism is the blood libel." It failed to understand that the Aftonbladet article was not a "slight and marginal piece," but rather that it reveals the growing tolerance in mainstream European media for the most hideous depictions of Israel and Jews. It's this legitimization of the illegitimate that should elicit the Globe's condemnation.

ECRUSY kicks off a year with new leadership

Compiled by CJN Staff

Chapter representatives from the Eastern Canadian region of United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY) recently spent four days in Ottawa building leadership skills, meeting with friends old and new and having a great time in the process.

What brought these representatives together was the annual Leadership Training Institute (LTI), a program that focuses on building leadership skills, preparing for the upcoming year in USY as a leader and learning how to grow and succeed both in and beyond USY.

Participants networked with ECRUSY and International USY, getting to know chapter and regional counterparts and meeting other USY leaders.

The USYers also participated in a bar mitzvah and an aufruf.

"Being with a congregation, especially helping to celebrate life-cycle events, adds to the USYer's learning experience. It's a moment that teaches how intimately all of us, teens, adults, families, are connected to the community," says ECRUSY director Rabbi Jennifer Gorman.

Follwing the aufruf, USYers sang wedding songs at the congregational lunch on Shabbat.

"Everyone enjoyed it so much that the mother of the groom said we were all invited to the wedding the next day."

USY leaders gathered in Ottawa for the annual Leadership Training Institute

Each LTI participant takes home tools, both mental and physical, for the coming year, including position handbooks, programming ideas and outlines and a renewed sense of ruach.

ECRUSY's activities start Sept. 12 for USY, with a team-building circus program, and Sept. 13 for Kadima, with a limousine scavenger hunt.

For more information, contact the ECRUSY office at 416-667-1717.

Spotlight on Thorne Mill on Steeles

A Sunrise Senior Living Community

Since its opening two years ago, Thorne Mill on Steeles has become home to seniors seeking a vibrant, caring and social community. Residents have traded the responsibilities of home ownership for comfortable surroundings, superb amenities and a host of activities to help them get the most out of life.

Walking through the doorway of Thorne Mill on Steeles, people feel the difference immediately. The décor is warm and inviting, the common areas are a buzz with activity – whether it be sharing a coffee with a friend in the bistro, gathering in the library to read or knit, surfing the internet, attending an afternoon line dancing group or a yoga class in the gym. "At Thorne Mill on Steeles, we believe that everything should revolve around the needs of our residents," says Karen Spear, Executive Director. "It's your life and we are here to help you live it your way, everyday!" Thorne Mill on Steeles has truly become a vibrant community!

Residents benefit from a selection of services and amenities that help make their life more comfortable, care free and more secure. In addition to the scheduled transportation for shopping, medical appointments, religious observances and weekly housekeeping and linen service, Thorne Mill on Steeles residents also have the comfort of knowing that a full range of on-site healthcare options are available. "We offer additional care choices, including the option to purchase on-site care services in your suite. Residents may also move within the community to our assisted living or memory care neighbourhoods," says Karen Spear. "Our commitment is to provide options and choices that allow Thorne Mill on Steeles to serve all seniors, regardless of their care concerns, now and in the future".

Not only is Thorne Mill on Steeles ideal for individuals living on their own and seeking a place where they can thrive among new found friends, but with the unique care levels available, we have enabled couples to move in together that have varying needs. "We believe that just because one spouse requires daily support – care for one should not have to overwhelm both. We are here to help remove the stress and isolation that can be associated with caring for your loved one alone at home," says Karen Spear.

"We have also noticed an interesting trend recently, especially with the recent economic turndown. Women that have become widowed and have developed a close circle of friends. They are tired of maintaining their home and preparing meals alone. They enjoy and take great comfort in the company of their girlfriends. At this time in their lives, they realize it makes sense to explore a senior living community, but are anxious about making the move on their own and concerned about what the cost may be in the years to come," says Laura Stokes-Crain, Director of Sales and Marketing. "Therefore, we have recently introduced our Friends Forever Program. This provides an opportunity for two friends to share a spacious two bedroom/two bathroom suite. Moving into an apartment together as friends eases the transition to the new community and sometimes can be the first step in taking a more active interest in life". As reported in the Wall Street Journal, research among seniors has shown that those with a roommate felt better, felt healthier and felt their lives were better." At the same time, because the accommodation is shared, rent is lower than being in a private suite. Call today to tour these select suites and to learn more about our Friends Forever Program.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, "Bubbie's" birthday or a business banquet, you'll always be treated like a rock star at Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre (formerly the Skydome).

With a combined 27,000-square feet, including nightclubs and streetside patios, Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre offer a vast array of configurations for a wide variety of events, from five to 500 people, breakfast through late-night.

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for Hard Rock Cafe: "We've hosted countless bar mitzvahs, wedding receptions, product launches and press conferences. We've put on events for all types of companies, from Deloitte & Touche and The Toronto Star, to BMG Music. Guests love Hard Rock. It's a very unique environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on Hard Rock Cafe Toronto's walls, such as Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. Guests will also see a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen – better known as Paul Stanley of KISS – as well as a beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

And as a testament to the old adage, "rock 'n' roll never dies," Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre boasts dueling walls of The Rolling Stones' and The Beatles' memorabilia. So far, The Beatles are ahead with 23 pieces, including the hand-written lyrics to "Get Back." But if Brit Rock isn't your thing, you can check out some cool stuff from this side of the pond, like the guitar Jimi Hendrix used when recording "Little Wing," the jacket Buddy Holly wore on tour or Bo Diddley's guitar "Lucille." There is a tribute room to the "King" himself, where you can get a peek at Elvis's silk pajamas, among other things.

After the tour, DeOliveira explains that this is all part of the experience, that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "For instance, you can have a sit-down dinner or a buffet. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the cafes. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us, you're a rock star."

Symposium inspires educators to plant a school garden

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Linda Geva – a kindergarten, Grade 1 and 2 teacher at Hamilton's Kehila School – and her principal, Leia Ger-Rogers, were so inspired by a teaching garden workshop at the first annual Lola Stein Institute Symposium last week that they decided to plant a garden at their own school.

"It sounded very interesting and practical," Geva told The CJN as the two-day symposium, held at the Toronto Heschel School, wound up last Wednesday afternoon.

The Lola Stein Institute, which focuses on teacher training and curriculum development, was founded in 2003 within the Toronto Heschel School.

Ellen Kessler, Heschel's director of environmental studies and the driving force behind the school's organic garden at its inception 14 years ago, "made it sound so easy," Geva said.

Heschel soon to be an Ontario Eco-School

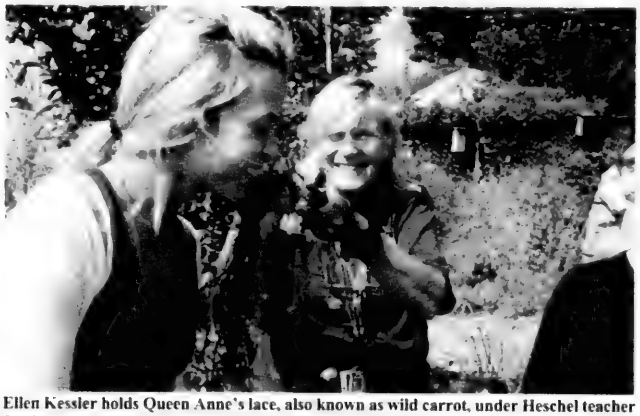
"They just put seeds in the ground, and [plants] grew amongst the weeds."

After attending the morning workshop – whose participants included educators from public and private schools – Ger-Rogers called Temple Anshe Shalom, where her school is housed, to request approval for the garden.



Ellen Kessler holds Queen Anne's lace, also known as wild carrot, under Heschel teacher Jordana Mednick's nose. The plant's root smells like carrot.

"It fits into all the different themes and units we do," she said, citing opportunities to use math skills for measuring, as one example.

Kessler advises that teachers have students document what they observe in a garden. As well, she noted, "the secret to getting little kids out is to have small groups and a caring adult."

To the best of her knowledge, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's northern branch, housed at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, is the only other local Jewish school to have on-site access to a similar garden. The Kavanah Organic Community Teaching Garden, a project of the Jewish Nature Centre of Canada: Torat HaTeva, in partnership with the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, opened there earlier this year.

Heschel is one of at least four Toronto-area Jewish day schools to be recognized as an Ontario Eco-School. Its garden activities include bird feeding, growing pumpkins that the students use to make soup and eco-art projects such as painting tires to shelter garlic plants.

"The environment is in serious need of committed educators," said Kessler. As of this September, according to the Ontario curriculum, every grade level in every subject area should have a component of environmental studies in it, she added.

Although she enjoys having more than 2,500 square feet for the teaching garden, Kessler said that such a large space isn't necessary.

The symposium also included a keynote address by Harvard University professor Howard Gardner. The author of more than 20 books is known for his theory of multiple intelligences, which offers a basis for educational support of diverse learning styles.

Maritimers recall Landa's leadership

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Shaul Landa, who passed away in Arad, Israel, on Aug 13, is being remembered as a driving force behind the formation and growth of the Atlantic Jewish Council and as a well-loved director of Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia.

The 68-year-old native of Poland, who emigrated to Edmonton from Russia with his family in the late 1940s, was recruited to Halifax from Israel in 1975 to lead the Atlantic regional coordinating body of Jewish communities by its then president, the late Ben Prossin.

"He was a bright light, an enjoyable person to be around, and injected a lot of youthful energy into AJC and the community in general," recalled Halifax lawyer and businessman Frank Medjuck.

Driving force behind formation of AJC

Halifax businessman Zack Rubin met Landa at a Young Judea national conference in 1959 when both were teenagers. "He was full of enthusiasm then, and that excitement for life and learning and spreading the word of Israel and everything Jewish stayed with him forever."

Rubin and Landa remained in contact for decades – as young men spending a year in Israel at the Institute for Youth Leaders from Abroad, then as staff at Camp Biluim, and when Rubin and his family lived in Israel for several years in the 1980s.

"Shaul was executive director of AJC from 1975 to 1978, when he returned to Israel for the remainder of his life," Rubin said. "When my family made aliyah for several years, we remained strong friends, our families spending much time together."

In Halifax, Shalom Magazine, the regular connection between Maritime communities, also read avidly by ex-Maritimers living around the world, was his pet project, says Shaul's wife of 42 years, Elana Landa, speaking by telephone from Israel.

"He loved the region and the people," she said. "He travelled extensively in the region, encouraging people to participate [in Jewish activities], to grow and be involved."

She said she and Shaul loved Camp Kadimah.

"This is where Shaul bloomed, flourished and became energized, if he wasn't enough already," she said with a chuckle. "It was an atmosphere he believed in. He was there heart and soul, ensuring young people should know about Israel. He tried to inspire that feeling, and pass it on to the campers."

She called Shaul a "people person" who was involved in programming, education and even journalism.

Medjuck and Rubin both recalled Landa's weekly Halifax radio show on Israeli issues, intermingled with music and culture. "He made sure the wider community knew about the Jewish people living here," Rubin said.

When the Landas returned to Israel in 1978, Shaul became program director of the World Union of Jewish Students, a program for university graduates who came to Israel from abroad to learn Hebrew and experience the country before starting their own careers.

"It was right up his alley," said Elana, who met Shaul when both were students at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. "It was similar to the Kadimah situation. Shaul was always the educator, always the promoter."

His strengths, she said, were his optimism, his undying belief in the State of Israel, a belief in human values and a thirst for knowledge in world politics.

Landa, who was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis in 1997, died in his sleep from a stroke. He leaves Elana, four children (including one living in Israel) and three grandchildren.

Bringing salt rooms into the mainstream

Compiled by CJN Staff

JERUSALEM — Derech Hamelach, a network of 14 salt-room treatment centres throughout Israel, recently launched its newest facility, a speleotherapy (salt room therapy) clinic and research and development centre on the campus of Hadassah Ein Kerem's Jerusalem BioPark.

The new treatment centre, Israel's largest speleotherapy clinic, will be operated by Breathewell Ltd., the proprietors of another clinic in Modi'in.

In the nine years since Derech Hamelach opened the doors of its first salt room in Haifa, 13 additional facilities have been launched across the country, including treatment centres in Ra'anana, Petah Tikva, Be'er Sheva, Akko and Eilat.

As a result of the speleotherapy treatments, thousands of patients have found relief from respiratory ailments such as asthma, bronchitis, chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, sinusitis and chronic ear infections.

"We are delighted to be opening our newest branch at the Jerusalem BioPark on the campus of Hadassah Ein Kerem, a world-renowned research institution and the top research hospital in Israel," said Jonathan Kestenbaum, co-founder and managing partner of Breathewell Ltd. and chairman of Derech Hamelach.

"Our hope is that our proximity to and affiliation with Hadassah will lead to major advances in the research, and ultimately the treatment, of respiratory diseases."

Speleotherapy is a natural respiratory remedy whereby dry salt aerosol is passively inhaled in a specially constructed salt room, or "speleochamber." The therapy – popular in Russia and eastern Europe – involves breathing in microscopic salt particles that act as a natural disinfectant, accelerating mucus clearance and improving lung function while killing harmful bacteria and soothing the respiratory system.

Though speleotherapy is currently seen as a treatment for "sick people," Derech Hamelach hopes that its salt rooms will begin to attract individuals without respiratory conditions who see regular treatments as a quick and effortless way to keep their lungs healthy and strengthen their immune systems – keys for healthy living.

CELEBRATE THE TRADITION

Helping the elderly get steady on their feet

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL21C

If you are one of the many Canadians who can walk but are afraid of falling, a new Israeli invention that was developed from NASA science might be just the thing to get your toes tapping, without fear of losing your balance.

Medigait's virtual walker consists of a set of high-tech goggles and a lightweight control unit that clips to your belt.

Becoming unsteady on your feet is a natural part of aging. It can also be caused by a stroke or diseases like Parkinson's and multiple sclerosis.

The Gaitaid device was developed by Medigait, a company founded in 2008 by Prof. Yoram Baram from the Technion Israel Institute of Science. It was perfected during a period of research that lasted 11 years, some of which was commissioned by NASA to improve helicopter navigation.

When Baram first learned that tiled floors can help people who are unsteady on their feet improve their step, he merged that information with his NASA research, and the idea for Gaitaid was born.

Baram's Gaitaid device is a "virtual walker" that consists of a small lightweight control unit and a set of high-tech goggles. A wearer dons the goggles, clips the control unit onto a belt or the waistband of a pair of pants and starts to walk, simple as that.

Scientific studies have measured a 20 to 30 per cent improvement in gait performance from wearing the device. Wearers improve their stride length and rhythm, helping to restore their normal walking ability.

The goggles look similar to those worn by Keanu Reeves in The Matrix. They serve as a training tool that helps people with walking problems plant their feet more firmly on the ground. The goggles superimpose a tiled floor on the wearer's view of the floor, while audio accompaniment lets a person "hear" their steps.

"The goggles are the visual part of it, which is just for training, but it does have an audio part as well and this can be used online," says Baram.

"A person disconnects the visual part, the glasses, and just connects a pair of earphones to get audio feedback," he tells ISRAEL21C.

"People with disabilities and walking disorders are helped a lot by sensory feedback," he says, explaining that it's not only the eyes that help a person to walk. While feeling your feet touch the ground is part of the process, there are feedback mechanisms in the brain that rely on a number of senses working in tandem to make smooth walking possible.

When worn for about 20 minutes a day, the goggles can rewire your brain.

"We are providing an auditory and visual [experience] most close to the mid brain, where the motor abilities are regulated and in some cases damaged," says Baram. "By providing sensory feedback we are enhancing regular walking and stability."

Margarita, from the United States, bought a Gaitaid device for her husband.

"[My husband] was in a very bad condition where he could barely walk and was very afraid of walking. Now what has happened is that he is able to do much better walking. He is able to go downstairs and get the mail by himself.

"It's giving him mobility inside our apartment, where mostly he used to be grounded and only walk to the bathroom. Now he is free and is roaming around our place," she adds.

With an FDA seal of approval and a U.S. distributor, Gaitaid can be purchased for about $2,000 or rented to own over time, which costs slightly more.

Clinical trials testing the efficacy of the device were conducted at centres in the United States and Israel, and published papers appearing in journals such as Neurology have demonstrated the effectiveness of Gaitaid in improving walking ability.

For grandparents who like the idea of looking like they've stepped out of a sci-fi film, take note: according to Baram, the goggles should be worn for training purposes only.

The technology for Gaitaid is based on a navigation device for helicopters that was developed to detect if a helicopter flies too close to a building or tree, and if so, to sound an alarm.

In addition to promoting Gaitaid, Baram is also researching machine and biological learning, and the neuroscience and processes in the brain that enable devices like Gaitaid to work.

Baram and his son run the Israel-based Medigait out of Haifa. While only a hundred or so devices have been sold to date, Baram is confident that with an investor or strategic partner, Gaitaid could be more affordable and accessible to many more people.

On Tuesday evening, August 4th, I fell close to my car (white Nissan Altima), in front of the Metro store in Lawrence plaza. Several people gathered around and were most helpful, especially "Jordan".
Sincerest thanks to all of you for your concern, attention and caring,

Adena Kogan.

Simanim – sign me up for a sweet and healthy New Year

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

From the time I was a young child, I always knew that apples and honey were served for Rosh Hashanah, symbolizing sweetness for the coming New Year. In addition to the traditional wine and challah, other special dishes are used as "signs" for a good omen. Instead of dipping chunks of challah in salt, as we usually do, we dip challah in honey. We also dip apple slices in honey and ask God that we be renewed for a sweet year.

For the traditional festive meal on the first night of Rosh Hashanah, there is a special ceremony for the blessing and eating of symbolic foods. These significant omens (simanim meelta) and are based on a talmudic teaching. We say a short prayer about the symbolism of each of the following foods before we eat them. The special foods and what they symbolize are as follows:

Apple dipped in honey (that we should have a good and sweet year – honey in general); fenugreek or carrots (that we should increase our merits); leeks or cabbage (that our enemies be decimated); beets (that our adversaries be removed); dates (that our enemies be consumed); gourd (that the decree of our sentence should be torn asunder, and our merits be proclaimed to God); pomegranate (that our merits increase, as the seeds of the pomegranate); fish (that we should be fruitful and multiply); head of a fish or a sheep's head (that we should be as a head and not a tail).

We also try to use foods whose names point toward signs and omens. Carrots (gezer in Hebrew) are a popular item since in Hebrew, gezer, is the same word for carrot and a decree. So we request that God will withhold any evil gezer (decree). Other customs include serving golden chicken soup so that we may have a golden year, a plate of vegetables so that we may have a year of abundance and plenty, and round, coiled challah (also known as a feigel).

My friend Helene Medjuck of Toronto likes to serve a whole smoked whitefish including the head, and uses an olive for the eye. Her children and husband are not too thrilled with her food garnishing techniques, but Helene isn't the least bit concerned. Her son Alexander was once at someone's home where they served a sheep's head and he said it was actually delicious!

Some people take a stalk of celery and some raisins and prior to eating them, they request God to help them get a "raise in their salary."

Just as we try to eat special dishes on Rosh Hashanah, we refrain from other foods. Nuts are avoided because they have a tendency to lodge in the throat, thus making proper prayer difficult and also because they have the same numerical equivalent (in Hebrew) as sin, which we are trying to avoid. Some people won't use vinegar or mustard to avoid sour or sharp flavours.

To make Rosh Hashanah an even sweeter holiday, Jayne Cohen, author of Jewish Holiday Cooking: A Food Lover's Treasury of Classics and Improvisations (Wiley) and her daughter Alex always bring a fragrant honey back from every trip. This has become their own special Rosh Hashanah tradition.

Jayne Cohen writes in her book, "There is a world of difference between ordinary supermarket honey and an artisinal product. If you absolutely can't track down a special honey for Rosh Hashanah, make your plain honey more distinctive. Warm 1 cup honey in a small saucepan. Stir in sprigs of fresh thyme, rosemary, or mint; fresh sage leaves; or 2 tsp. dried lavender. Cover and let steep for several hours. Then heating the honey first if necessary, strain it. Or beat into the honey a few drops of a flavouring extract such as strawberry, lemon, or even almond, or a spoonful of very reduced aromatic fruit juice (apple-raspberry, for example)."

Cohen further explains, "Rosh Hashanah celebrates the pun in the prayers recited at the evening meal over many of the symbolic foods. On this solemn holiday, blessings in Hebrew and the many languages of the Diaspora reflect a rather humorous tickling of words. Who cannot see the twinkling in the eyes of the sages as we, in a modern English adaptation, eat beets to "beat back our foes" and dates to "date this year as one of happiness and peace?" Leek in Hebrew is kartee, which sounds like the word yihartu, to cut off. So Sephardim eat leek patties to "cut off their enemies."

Take gefilte fish up a notch

Here are some special dishes using the special symbolic foods to ensure you'll have an especially sweet and healthy New Year!

JAYNE COHEN'S NORTH AFRICAN COOKED CARROT SALAD

The play of sweet cooked carrot and tangy dressing makes this easy traditional North African salad a favourite. Jayne likes to serve it Sephardi-style: that is, along with the appetizers, then left on the table during the rest of the meal, a welcome counterpoint to the panoply of rich Rosh Hashanah foods to follow.

For the Dressing:

about 3 tbsp. best-quality extra virgin olive oil about 1 1/2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 garlic clove, finely minced about 1 tsp ground cumin, preferably freshly toasted and ground about 1 tsp. sweet paprika
about 1 tsp. dried mint about 1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon about 1/4 tsp. ground coriander salt and freshly ground black pepper
cayenne (optional)

For the salad:

1 lb. sweet-tasting carrots, preferably organic and or locally grown, scraped salt
2 to 3 tbsp. chopped flat-leaf parsley or cilantro

Prepare the dressing: in a large bowl, whisk together the oil, lemon juice, garlic, cumin, paprika, mint, cinnamon, coriander, salt and pepper, and cayenne, if using, to taste.

You can cut the carrots into 1/2-in. rounds, on the diagonal – a common method – or, even better, take a few moments extra to cut them into thick matchsticks, so there is more surface area to drink in the dressing. To do this, use either the julienne blade of the food processor, a mandoline, or cut by hand, quartering the carrots lengthwise first, then slicing them into even sticks.

Cook the carrots in lightly salted boiling water until they are tender but still crisp. Drain them (the liquid would be a nice addition to vegetable stock), and while they are still warm, toss them with the dressing. For best taste, let the flavours marry for at least a couple of hours.

Taste and adjust the oil, lemon juice, or seasoning, if needed. Sprinkle with the parsley or cilantro just before serving. Yield: 4 servings. Multiplies easily.

For a quick twist on preparing a frozen gefilte fish loaf, try Jamie Geller's Spiced Gefilte Fish. Jamie says, "This recipe is so good I chose it for the cover of my cookbook 'Quick and Kosher: Recipes from the Bride Who Knew Nothing.' The original recipe comes from my recipe tester, Joy's father-in-law. The colder the fish the better, I think. About half an hour before the meal, slice and arrange the fish on a platter and keep it chilling in the refrigerator until just before serving."

JAMIE GELLER'S SPICED GEFILTE FISH

Prep: 7 minutes
Cook: 2 hours, 30 minutes
Chill: 4 hours

1 (22-oz.) loaf frozen gefilte fish
1 (10-oz.) bag frozen chopped onions
1 (1-lb.) bag frozen crinkle cut carrots
2 stalks fresh celery, chopped
1/4 tsp. dried dill weed or 1 sprig fresh dill
1/4 tsp. dried parsley flakes or 2 sprigs fresh parsley
1/4 tsp. celery seed
1/8 tsp. dried thyme or 1 sprig fresh thyme
1/8 tsp. ground allspice
8 to 10 capers
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
2 cups water

Preheat oven to 350. Line 9 x 5 x 3-in. loaf pan with onions, carrots and celery. Rinse frozen gefilte loaf under water to remove parchment wrapper and place in loaf pan.

Sprinkle dill weed, parsley, celery seed, thyme, allspice, capers, salt and pepper evenly over fish. Pour water in loaf pan around sides of fish and cover with foil.

Bake at 350 for 2 hours and 30 minutes. Transfer fish and vegetables to a sealable container, cover and refrigerate until cold, at least 4 hours. Slice and serve with vegetables. Yield: 8 servings.

The following recipes from my latest cookbook, Norene's Healthy Kitchen: Eat Your Way to Good Health (Whitecap) are sure to please the guests at your yom tov table. The recipes I've chosen include the following simanim: pomegranates, carrots, honey, beets and apples. You'll also find more ideas on my website at www.gourmania.com. Enjoy in good health!

NORENE'S POMEGRANATE CHICKEN

Source: Norene's Healthy Kitchen

According to ancient lore, the amount of seeds in the pomegranate is exactly the same number (613) as the mitzvot (commandments/good deeds) found in the Torah. If you're curious, count away! This fragrant dish also contains honey, carrots, and apricots – traditional foods served with hope for a sweet and fruitful New Year.

2 medium onions, sliced
2 cups baby carrots (or 2 cups peeled and sliced regular carrots)
2 whole chickens (3 1/2 lb. each), cut into pieces
1 tsp dried thyme
kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper
1 cup dried whole apricots, loosely packed
1 cup pitted whole prunes, loosely packed
2 tsp sweet paprika

Marinade:

1 cup pomegranate juice (or juice of 1 pomegranate)
2 cloves garlic (about 2 tsp. minced) juice and rind of 1 lemon
1/3 cup balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. honey

Spray a large roasting pan with cooking spray. Scatter the onions and carrots in the bottom of the pan. Rinse the chicken well and pat dry with paper towels. Trim the excess fat. Place the chicken on top of the vegetables and sprinkle – under the skin and on top – with thyme, and salt and pepper to taste. Tuck the apricots and prunes between the chicken pieces.

Whisk the ingredients for the marinade together in a bowl. (If using the juice of a whole pomegranate, reserve some of the seeds for garnish.) Pour over the chicken and sprinkle with paprika. Cover and marinate in the refrigerator for at least 1 hour or for as long as 2 days.

When the chicken is marinated, preheat the oven to 350. Cook the chicken, covered, for 1 1/2 hours or until tender. Uncover and cook for 30 minutes longer, basting occasionally, or until the skin is golden. Remove the pan and let cool before refrigerating overnight.

Beet me up, Scotty!

About 30 minutes before serving, remove and discard any congealed fat from the chicken. Reheat, covered, for 25 to 30 minutes at 350.

Transfer the heated chicken to a large serving platter and sprinkle with pomegranate seeds. Serve immediately. Yield: 12 servings. Keeps for up to 3 days in the refrigerator; reheats well. Freezes well for up to 4 months

Chef's Secrets:

• One pomegranate contains about 3/4 cup seeds and yields 1/2 cup juice

• No pomegranates? Substitute either bottled pomegranate or cranberry juice. If desired, sprinkle with toasted pumpkin or sesame seeds at serving time.

NORENE'S ROASTED BEET SALAD

Source: Norene's Healthy Kitchen

Roast and Boast! Roasting beets enhances the flavour, producing beets that are moist and tender. You can't "beet" that! Boiling only lessens their flavour – once you try roasting, you won't prepare them any other way.

2 lb (1 kg) fresh beets
1/2 cup thinly sliced red onions
3 tbsp. orange juice (preferably fresh)
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. honey
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Preheat the oven to 400. Scrub the beets well and then trim the stems and roots to within 1 in. Spray a large piece of heavy-duty foil with cooking spray. Place the beets in the centre and wrap tightly, pinching the edges of foil together.

Bake for about 1 to 1 1/4 hours or until tender. (Beets are done when a metal skewer glides easily through them.)

When fully roasted, remove from the oven, carefully open up the foil packet and let the beets stand until cool enough to handle. Using paper towels, rub off the skins and then cut the beets into 1/4-in.-thick rounds. Arrange the beet slices on a platter and scatter with the onion slices.

Whisk together the orange juice, olive oil, mustard, and honey in a small bowl. Drizzle the mixture over the beets and onions, then sprinkle with salt and pepper to taste. Serve warm or at room temperature. Yield: 8 servings. Keeps for up to 2 or 3 days in the refrigerator.

Chef's Secrets:

• Beet Me Up, Scotty! Choose fresh beets that are roughly the same size for even cooking. Large beets tend to be tough, so small-to-medium-sized are best, about 4 oz (125 g) each.

• Buffet Beauty: For a beautiful presentation, use both red and golden beets. Arrange them in separate piles on a platter so that the colours don't bleed into each other. If golden beets aren't available, alternate the beets with orange slices.

Estee Kafra, author of Spice it Right (Hamodia Treasures), shared this fantastic recipe with me which is sure to impress the guests at your Rosh Hashanah table. Estee explained to me that since some people's minhag is not to eat nuts on Rosh Hashanah, toasted slivered almonds can be substituted for the pistachios. The numerical value of nuts (egoz) equals the numerical value of "chet" which means "sin." Estee told me that almonds are called shkedim in Hebrew, which has a different numerical value. If you prefer, you can omit them.

Holiday Wine Suggestions

By YONATAN STERNBERG
Special to The CJN

Many new players have joined the Israeli wine industry and with so many quality wines to choose from, going wine shopping can get pretty confusing. I'm sure you'll agree that aside from quality, personal taste and maybe uniqueness, value for money is one of the key selling points for a winery or wine. With the holiday season coming up in just a couple of weeks and last minute dinner plans being made, I decided to narrow down the options and offer several holiday wine suggestions

Founded in 1995, the Dalton winery was one of the first to recognize the Upper Galilee's tremendous potential as a prime wine making region. Over the years Dalton has earned a reputation of offering high quality wines which (for the most part) provide excellent value for money. The winery currently produces close to one million bottles annually, which are divided into several series, including: Reserve, Alma, D Series and Cna'an – the last two are intended for relatively early drinking, and are not intended for aging. Among Dalton's recent releases are the Shiraz and Cabernet Sauvignon 2008 of the winery's D series. Personally, I preferred the Shiraz, showing concentrated aromas and flavours of blackberry fruits, cherries and dark chocolate along with hints of black pepper and vanilla.

Another excellent value for money winery is the Galil Mountain Winery. Established some nine years ago as a joint venture between the Golan Heights Winery and the Yiron Kibbutz, the winery produces both varietal as well as blended red and white wines.

Galil Mountain is constantly raising the bar, improving the quality of their wines while demonstrating stability over the years. Both the red wines (especially the Merlot and Cab) and the rosé style wine of the winery's Galil Mountain series are definitely among the top wines in their price range. Daniel Rogov, a leading Israeli wine critic credited Galil's winemaker Micha Vaadia with showing some positive chutzpah in the winery's recently launched Meron 2006 wine. It's not every day that a winemaker chooses to create a blend based on 78 per cent Syrah, 11 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon and 11 per cent Petit Verdot - the result a very approachable and enjoyable wine. Deep purple in colour and with a somewhat silky texture, the wine offers layered aromas of black berry fruits, blueberries, plums and fresh herbs all leading to a long and satisfying finish.

While I am not suggesting that the Yatir winery is necessarily a value for money producer, their wines are receiving excellent reviews both in Israel and abroad. This time a joint venture between the grape growers of the region and the Carmel Winery, the Yatir winery is situated in the northeastern Negev, helping fulfil the dream of David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, of making the desert bloom.

Ranked among the top five wineries in Israel by several leading international wine publications, Yatir currently produces wines in two series: the premiere label Yatir Forest and the Yatir label. My favourites by this winery include the Yatir Forest and the Yatir Shiraz. Yatir Shiraz, 2006 – blended with 15 per cent Malbec grapes, full bodied and still firm, the wine is showing concentrated aromas of black berry fruits, raspberry, black cherries, toasted oak and leather. Try serving alongside grilled red meats or a juicy beef pot roast.

Holiday Food Ideas

American chefs' kosher creations

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Not long ago, I picked up a second-hand kosher cookbook called The Great Chefs of America Cook Kosher (Vital Media Enterprises, 1996).

At the time of the purchase, I didn't notice the authorship. Rather, I was struck by the book's offerings, a collection of more than 175 kosher, haute cuisine recipes. Celebrity chefs like Emeril Lagasse, Bobby Flay and Wolfgang Puck were among the contributors to the publication, which was initially conceived as a fundraiser for the Jewish National Fund (JNF).

The book contains some novel culinary ideas, especially for the holiday season. Why serve gefilte fish or kasha and bow ties when you can wow friends and family with paupiettes of smoked salmon with walnut vinaigrette and buckwheat risotto with wild leeks and goat cheese?

Recently, there has been renewed interest in this 13-year-old cookbook because the executive co-editor happens to be Ruth Madoff, 68, wife of the notorious swindler Bernie Madoff the architect of a staggering $65-billion Ponzi scheme that financially decimated thousands of investors and scores of charitable foundations.

The book's biographical page indicates that its executive editor, Ruth Madoff, received a master of science in nutrition from New York University in 1992. "She has been happily sampling food and testing recipes from around the United States in preparation for this cookbook," her bio says.

An ironic comment appeared in the Jewish daily newspaper the Forward's web edition on Dec. 16. It cited a 1996 press release quoting the cookbook's other co-executive editor, Idee Schoenheimer. "She said that Madoff tested the so-called healthy dishes and disqualified those made with cream. 'Ruth was our conscience.'"
